Regna, duces, populi, fœdera, bella, quies.

Sr. Rich. Saint George Norrey King at Armes, in fauour of this Worke.

It is farre from my purpose, to commend without cause, or by ouercurious floriſh to make a ſhadow ſeeme a ſubſtance, this worke needs no ſuch decептio viſus; The ſubiect is of it ſelfe honorable, and able to ſtand without ſuch weake proppes. The glory of our Nation being almoſt buried in the pit of obſcurity, is herein reuiued, the continuance of Chriſtianity traced from age to age, the antiquity and ſituation of our Townes, Caſtles, Religious Houſes, Nobility, and all other memorable matters, ſo liuely portraied, as in a glaſſe wee may rightly diſcerne the true ſhape, quality and condition of each of them in particular. This worke therefore being now brought vpon the publike ſtage and view of the world, may in my poore cenſure giue ſatisfaction to the learned Reader, and abide the touch of the malignant oppoſer; which being effected without hope of gaine, or vaine oſtentation with ſo great care both of body and mind, is the more precious, for, difficilia quæ pulchra. Wherein Gods power is made knowne in this his weake, but worthy inſtrument: and the glory of Great Britaine made more famous to the world, as well in the Geographicall dimenſion of the Lands ſituation, as in the Hiſtoricall relations of her moſt famous Monarchs, and glorious Actions: no Kingdome hitherto ſo particularly deſcribed, nor Nations Hiſtory by true record more faithfully penned: In honor whereof, I ſacrifice theſe lines of my loue, vpon the Altar of this worke, and celebrate the Authors remembrance to future poſterities.

To my friend Mr Iohn Speed, being very ſicke.

Great loue, and little skill may cauſe me to miſſay.
But certainely this ſicknes cannot make thee die:
Though cruell ſymptomes, and theſe thirteene yeers aſſay
For thy dear country, doth thy health & ſtrength decay;
Yet ſith thy toylſome labour, and thy induſtry
Is for thy Countries ſake, her fame to raiſe:
Shee ſhall thy temples crowne with euerlaſting bayes,
And in deſpite of death, ſhall cauſe thy memory
To liue in endleſſe fame with all poſterity.
Now may ſhee ſee her beauty, and her riches ſtore,
What erſt ſhee was in eu'ry age, and change of ſtate,
And preſent greatnes ſuch as neuer heretofore,
Since this great Monarch rul'd from north to ſoutherne ſhore.
And ſith thy life is to thy Country dedicate,
Let none preſume thy lawrell from thy head to reaue
For this her ſtory, which thy skilfull hand did weaue,
But liue, & weare it (Speed) vntil the worlds great fate
Shall bring all earthly things vnto their vtmoſt date.

OF him that this GREAT Taske hath done
(great for the goodneſſe many wayes)
FAME doth affirme he well hath wonne
ARTS higheſt Prize, and Palme of praiſe.
In Climes, and Realmes remote throughout,
His merits merit rare report:
For none the like hath brought about;
Or equaliz'd in any ſort.
The Shafts of his endeuours, ſhot
At Gaine, and Pleaſure, both haue hit:
His Obſeruations haue begot
On priuate, publike Benefit.
Chiefe Cities, Townes, and Countries many (Which this vaſt Globe of Earth affords)
I oft haue viewd; but neuer any
So well deſcrib'd by Mappes and Words.
His trauel'd Body, toiled Mind
(To bring this Worke at laſt to reſt
In Period which his Plot deſignd)
Should now reſt famous with the beſt.
The Romans ſuch Deſerts did Crowne
With Laurell, which their Soile brought forth;
But I, of Branches farre off growne,
Bring Wreaths to this worke, more of worth,
The Palme (wherein rare vertues bee,
And, for a Conqueſt, Crownes a King)
The Oliue, and the Cedar Tree,
Faire, fat, and fruitfull; theſe I bring.
In Egypt, Syria, and the Land
Of Promiſe, (named by holieſt High)
I could not ſee, nor vnderſtand,
For vertue, any Trees come nigh.
As theſe (worth praiſe) are profitable,
They being of the worthieſt kinds:
So in beſt ſence, hath Speed been able,
To pleaſe (worth praiſe) the worthieſt Minds.
In ſhort, to giue him then his due,

THE PROEME.

TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS.

OF GREAT BRITAINES GLORY.

Hauing thus farre trauelled in the portrai, and deſcription of this famous Empire of GREAT BRITAINE, I might here haue reſted and claimed the priuiledge that yeeres and imbecillity haue brought me vnto: had not a further deſire in others vrged it a matter incident, hiſtorically to lay down the originals of thoſe Nations, and ſucceſſions of thoſe Monarchs, which either by birth or conqueſt haue aſpired to the Imperiall Crowne. And albeit I finde my ſelfe both tired in the former; and moſt vnfit to proſecute this latter, yet will I endeauour to giue herein my beſt aſſaies; though as my labours, ſo my wants alſo, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world,

For if thoſe men were blame-worthy againſt whom Heraclite exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble find a little pure ſubſtance in a great deale of baſe earth: how ſhall I then free mee from the like imputation, that from ſo many mines of pure metals, haue gotten ſo little Oare, and the ſame neither well tried in my defectiue fornace, nor yet Heraclite.

artificially cast off through the default of the mould; wanting both skill for to fashion, and measure to performe the true proportions that in such a proiect is to bee required; and how often these my defects haue dis-swaded my proceedings, is best knowne to him that is the searcher of the heart.

But by what fate I am inforced still to goe forward, I know not vnlesse it bee the ardent affection and loue to my natiue Country; wherein I must confesse that Nature in those gifts hath beene both liberall, yea and prodigall, though Fortune as sparing and fast handed against me, euer checking the Bit with the Raines of necessity, and curbing the meanes that should illustrate my labours: which mooues mee oftentimes to thinke that if the great Philosopher Theophrastus, had cause on his death-bed to accuse Nature, for giuing man so long a lesson, and so short a life; then I against Fortune may as iustly exclaime, that hath assigned mee so great a subiect and so little meanes. And therefore let it not seeme offensiue that I draw my waters from the Cesterns of others, who am not able to fetch them at the spring-head my selfe: Neither that I strike vpon the same Anuile vnto their sound, though nothing so loud, nor with the like strength; wherein yet this fruit at least will (I hope) redound of my endeauours that I shall incite the more learned: if not otherwise, yet in emulation of mee, to free the face drawne by Apelles, from the censure of the fault or defect in the foote, and not onely to amend, but euen to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neere spent; and with Barzillai I may say that musicke to me is now vnpleasing: yet doth my eare thirst after the set of that straine, as Socrates thoughts ranne euer on his Booke: who the night before hee was to suffer death was desirous to learne musicke, because he would die learning still something. Moses the first Gouernour of that Common-wealth, which whiles it stood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all Kingdomes succeeding, left this as a Law to remaine for euer, That the Fathers should teach their children; and should commit vnto writing those things which the Lord in their dayes had done; and enioyned the children likewise to Enquire of the times that were past, euen from the first creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common-weales and Cities, doe end and perish, yet the Histories thereof doe remaine and liue; And that made Cicero to say as hee did, That Salamina should be vtterly forgotten before the things that were done in Salamina should perish: And therefore as among the wise answers of Thales, the Histories of Countries are to be accounted accounted for principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Mistris of life, and expositions of Times; so likewise let vs from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That hee is perfectly happy which knowes his natiue country, to bee truely glorious. And as Cassidore calles him a worthy Citizen, that seeketh the commodity of his country: So contrariwise he is by Bale esteemed but a fruitlesse clod of earth, that sucks the sappe of his soile onely to himselfe, whose memoriall shall perish as the dispersed smoake in the clouds, though for a time he mount aloft in his swelling pride. This naturall loue and true affection to our natiue Country we may further learne from the ancient Patriarks and Fathers themselues; who besides a desire that they had to theirs, continually to liue therein during life, commanded their bodies to bee buried therein after death: from whose Bowels they first had assumed their breaths, and in whose bosome they layd their bones, as in their last bed of rest. Yea, of the vnreasonable creatures, the Birds and Beasts, wee may learne this loue, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countries grow vnkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blinde, suffered him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne country is not esteemed, as Ieremy felt it, and CHRIST IESVS taught, yet did the one for his peoples captiuity, wish his eyes a fountaine of teares, and the other for his countreys destruction lamented and wept, holding it vnlawfull to take the childrens bread, and to giue it vnto others.

And although our many Records are perished by the inuasions of strangers, through their couetous Conquest of so faire a Land; or in the ciuill dissentions of home bred aspirers that haue sought the possession of so rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left vs no lesse beholding vnto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would bee farre more famous. Neither is it to bee wondred at, that the Records of GREAT BRITAINE are eaten vp with Times teeth, as Ouid speakes, when as in Times ruines lye buried their Registers, that haue beene kept with a stronger guard, as Titus Liuy in the entrance of his History, affirmeth of the Romanes. As for those things (sayth hee) as are reported either before, or at the foundation of the City, more beautified and set out with Poets fables, then grounded vpon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to auerre nor disproue. Of whose vncertainties, let vs a while heare the reporters themselues speake, before wee proceed to the certaine successions of our British Monarchs: vntill which time the credit of our History may well bee said to waigh with (if not downe-peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane writer; who liued an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ) calleth the first world to the Flood vncertaine; and thence to the first Olympias fabulous: Because in that time (sayth hee) there is nothing related (for the most part) but Fables among the Greekes, Latines and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the liues of his worthy men no higher then Theseus: because (sayth hee) what hath beene written before, was but of strange things, and sayings full of monstrous fables imagined and deuised by Poets, which are altogether vncertrine and most vntrue. And Diodorus Siculus (that liued in Augustus Cæsars time, a great searcher after Antiquities and for thirty yeeres continuance a traueller into many Countries, for information and further satisfaction) writing his History called Bibliotheca, containing forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight, of his first sixe himselfe giueth this censure in his Proeme. These Bookes (saith hee) containing the Acts of ancient men before the destruction of Troy, with the ancient Histories aswell of Grecians as Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which mooued Lucretius the Poet to demaund this question:

Why haue not Poets in their workes of fained stories brought,
Things done before the Warres of Thebes, or Troyes destruction wrought?

Yea

Yea and of Troyes ſtory it ſelfe, if wee may beleeue Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an abſolute Hiſtorian) though it be ancient (ſaith hee) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complaineth of as much: For you Grecians (ſaith hee) as children in learning, deliuer onely things vncertaine, and haue mingled fables with the Warres of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which neuer were, but gathered out of the ſcattered Verſes of Homer and others, not digeſted by Ariſtarchus, and are yet vncertaine and obſcure. And that the Greekes indeed were but babes in Antiquity, Ioſephus in his Nations defence againſt Appion, ſufficiently doth approue, where hee affirmeth, That inuention of their Letters was not ſo old as the ſiege of Troy, inſomuch that the Poeſie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but ſung by roate. And the Latine tongue it ſelfe by M. Cato is ſaid, not to haue beene in vſe foure hundred and fifty yeeres before the building of Rome. And Titus Liuy their famous Hiſtorian, freely confeſſeth, That the vſe of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was very rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gaules. Yea, and of the vncertainty of Romes foundation, how lauiſhly ſoeuer Hiſtorians haue written, not onely Feneſtella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewiſe in the life of Romulus hath many ſayings, whereof this is one; The Hiſtorigraphers (ſaith hee) doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for that cauſe the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through the world) was firſt giuen vnto it; ſome affirming, that the Pelaſgiues after they had runne ouer a great part of the world, laſtly ſtayed themſelues in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great ſtrength in Armes, gaue name to that City Rome, which ſignifieth power in the Greeke tongue. Other ſay, that certaine Troyans after their ſiege, in certaine veſſels ſaued themſelues by flight, and being put into the Thuſcan Sea, anchored neere to the Riuer Tyber: whoſe wiues being extreamely Sea-ſicke, through the counſell of Roma a Lady the wiſeſt and worthieſt among them, ſet fire on the whole Fleet; wherupon ther husbands (though ſore offended) were inforced to make vſe of their preſent neceſſity, and neere vnto Palantium planted this City whoſe Fame preſently grew great, and in honour of Lady Roma named it Rome; and from hence they ſay the cuſtome of* kiſsing in ſalutations came; after the example of theſe Wiues, who to appeaſe their Huſbands

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER I.

BEsides those fruitfull Ilands, that dispersedly are scattered about the Mayne, like to beautifull pearles that incompasse a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAINE doth raise it selfe first to our sight, as the Body of that most famous and mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parcels and members. Being by the Almighty so set in the maine Ocean, as that shee is thereby the High Admirall of the Seas; and in the terrestriall Globe so seated, as that she is worthily reputed both The Garden of Pleasure, and The Storehouse of Profit, opening her Hauens euery way, fit to receiue all forraine traffick, and to vtter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Soueraigne Lady and Empresse of the rest) deserues our description in the first place.

BRITAINE Admirall of the Seas.

(2) This Iland is so spacious and ample, that Cæsar (the first Romane discouerer thereof) supposed that he had found out another World: for to his seeming it appeared, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne, to be compassed with the Ocean about. And Iulius Solinus, for her circuit and largenesse, sayth that it deserueth the name of another world. But Aristides a Greek Author speakes much more properly, who by way of excellency termeth BRITAINE, The Great Iland: As likewise Tacitus, that vndertooke to describe BRITAINE by his owne knowledge, who saith, that of all Ilands known to the Romans it was the greatest: And so doth Dionysius his description of the World.

In Paneg. oratore Constantium.

Aristides.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then knowen world, to a Cloke, Rutilius Numatianus, Italy to an Oken leafe, and Dionysius Spaine, vnto an Oxe-hide: so the said Tacitus in the life of Agricola, from Liuie his ancient, and Fabius Rusticus his moderne, doth liken the fashion thereof to a long Dish, or two-headed Axe: whose forme notwithstanding may better bee exposed to the eye, in the draught before seene, then can bee explained in words to conceit, or vnto any other thing bee compared besides it selfe: especially seeing that so many good Writers haue had but very bad successe in their resemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather vnlike to either, if wee speake of the whole, which then was vnknowen, as it seemeth by Tacitus. And the huge enorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia which runneth vnto the furthermost point, growing narrow and sharpe like a wedge, was first redoubled with the Romane fleet by Iulius Agricola, and BRITAINE discouered to bee an Iland, one hundred thirty and six yeeres

BRITAINE thought one continent with France.

(4) Some haue beene induced by the narrowneſſe of the Sea, and likeneſſe of the Soile, to thinke that BRITAINE was ſometimes ioyned to the Continent of France: whereunto Seruius Honoratus ſubſcribeth in his Commentary vpon the firſt Eclog of Virgil, who there mentioneth, Seruius Honorat.

——Penitùs toto diuiſos orbe Britannos,
The Britaine people quite from all the world diſioin'd.

Claudian.

As likewiſe by Claudian another ancient Poet it is ſtiled, ——noſtro deducta Britannia mundo,

The Britaine ſoile remooued from our worlds continent.

Vinianus.

And Vinianus with them affirmes, that in the beginning, Britaine and Gallia were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicily, which in times paſt hee reports to haue beene one with Italy. Others hold, that all Ilands had their firſt ſeparation from the Mayne by the rage of the generall Deluge, & that the mountaines thereby ſhewed their tops aboue the plaine grounds; and the plains ſetling lower, became deep vallies, when or howſoeuer, by Gods diuine ordinance and wiſedome, wee ſee that theſe Ilands ſituated in the Seas, doe no leſſe ſerue and adorne the Ocean it ſelfe, then the Lakes and Pooles of water doe the dry land, and all of them (as members of one maſſe) to miniſter ſuſtenance for the life of all things liuing, and pleaſures to the vſe and ſeruice of man.

Sicily thought once one continent with Italy.

(5) The Iland of BRITAINE, of all others the moſt famous (by Catullus reputed the furtheſt towards the Weſt) is bounded on the South with Normandie, and France, vpon the Eaſt with Germany and Denmarke, vpon the Weſt with Ireland & the Atlanticke Ocean, and vpon the North with the vaſt Deucalidon Seas The length thereof, meaſured by the graduations to both extremes, that is, from the Lyſard Point Southward in Cornwall, which lieth in the Latitude of 50 degrees and 6 minutes, to the Straithy-head in Scotland (being the furtheſt point of this Iland towards the North) ſet in the degree 60, and 30 minutes, containeth (according to the ſcale of the terreſtriall Globe) ſix hundred twenty foure miles: not to trouble the Reader with other accounts, ſeeing the ſame ſo exactly to agree with the ſpaces of the heauens. And the extent of the Land in the broadeſt part is from the Lands end in Cornwall in the Weſt (ſituated in 14 degrees and 37 minutes of Longitude, according to Mercator his Atlas) vnto the Iland Tenet in the Eaſt of Kent (lying in 22 degrees, 30 minutes) & containeth miles 340 as they haue deliuered that with curious ſearch haue laid the dimenſion thereof.

Catullus.

Britains bredth

(6) The ſite of this Iland is ſet by the Mathematicks in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewiſe placed betwixt the Parallels foureteene and twenty ſix: a ſeat as well for Ayre as Soile both fruitfull and milde; and for length of dayes, pleaſant and delightfull; for in the height of Summer the day is ſayd to be eighteene equinoctiall houres long, whereof ſixteen & a halfe are ſpent from Sunne to Sunne. Yea and Tacitus ſayth that in the furtheſt North part of the Iland the nights are ſo ſhort, that betwixt the going out, and comming in of the day the ſpace is hardly perceiued, and the Sunne ſeen neither to ſet nor ariſe: Becauſe (ſayth he) the extreme and plaine parts of the earth proiect a low ſhadow, and raiſe not the darkneſſe on high, ſo the night falleth vnder the ſky and ſtarre. Better might he haue ſayd, by reaſon of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon deſcending not directly, but paſſing obliquely, razing as it were vnder their Horizon.

Britaine in the 8. Climate for Latitude, and for Longitude placed betweene the parallels fourteene and twenty ſix.

In the furtheſt North part of Britaine the nights ſo ſhort as the ſpace betwixt the dayes going and comming can hardly be perceiued. In vita Agric.

(7) The ayre, ſayth Strabo and Tacitus, is rather inclinable to ſhowers then to ſnow. And Cæſar commends it to be more temperate, and the cold leſſer then that in France, as not ſubiect to either extremes as the more Northerne and Southerne Countries are: to which temperature Ceſcenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet ſeemeth to haue reſpect, when of this Iland thus he verſifieth:

Caſar com. li. 5. The cold in Britaine leſſe then in France.

Non illic Aries verno ferit æra cornu,
Gnoſia nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri.
The horned Ram there butteth not the ayre of tender ſpring;
The Twins, nor Bull doe to this ſoile vntimly ſeaſons bring.

Probus in Virgil. Georgic.

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubienſis the Arabian, The dark & dangerous Seas, in regard of the miſty vapors that there from ariſe, yet in the winter ſeaſon thoſe clouds are diſperſed into ſtill ſhowers of raine, that doe diſſolue the rigour and great extremity of the cold: yea and thoſe Seas themſelues ſtirred and working to & fro with the windes, doe thereby wax warme (as Cicero ſayth) ſo that a man may eaſily perceiue within that world of waters a certaine heat incloſed. And Minutius tius Fœlix, prouing that God hath a speciall regard to the seuerall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, sayth, that BRITAINE, though otherwhiles wanting the aspect of the Sunne, yet it is releeued with the warmth of her enuironing Seas, and as much refreshed, wee may well say, by those sweet and gentle winds that in the height of Summer are sent from those seas, & doe abate the rigor of the Sunnes great scorching heat; and yeeldeth not onely entercourse for traffique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all sorts of fish, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth foorth Pearles, as Tacitus sheweth, which were vsually cast out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. These Pearles, though not altogether so orient as they in India, by Amianus in his 23 booke and 12 chapter, are called rich gems. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirty fifth chapter, vseth the like terme: The desire whereof (as Suetonius sayth) drew Cæsars affection for the Conquest of Britaine.

Britaines sea-windes in summer asswage the heat.

In vita Agric.

In vita Cæsar. Cap. 47.

(9) The soile (sayth Tacitus) setting aside the Oliue, the Vine, & such other plant, as are onely proper to hotter Countries, taketh all kind of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it shooteth vp quickly, and ripeneth slowly: the cause of both is the same, the ouer-much moisture of the soile, and the aire: And Cæsar writeth that for timber it was stored of all kindes, as in Gallia, the Beech and Firre-trees onely excepted. For abundance of Graine, Britaine is sayd to be The seat of Queene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouse for the Westerne World, as Charles the great tearmed it. And by our own ancestors in the blacke Booke of the Exchequer, it is called a Paradise of pleasure. From whence the Romanes were wont yeerely to transport (with a fleet of eight hundred vessels bigger then Barges) great store of corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each seueral blessing belonging to this most happy Iland, wee will not againe enter, seeing that in euery County wee haue sufficiently, and no more then truly, spoken thereof. Onely, if you please heare what hath been said of this Land by the Roman Orators, and first in the Panegyricke to Constantius the Emperour.

Britaine abounded with all sorts of graine

Cæsar com. li. 5.

Britaine called the seate of Q. Ceres.

Romans laded 800. vessels with corne in Britaine for their armies elsewhere. Zosimus.

(10) O happy BRITAINE, and more fortunate then all other Lands beside, which first didst see Constantine Emperour. For good cause hath nature endowed thee with all blessings both of aire & soile: wherin there is neither excessiue cold of Winter, nor extream heat of summer: wherein there is so great abundance of graine, that it sufficeth both for bread and drinke. There the forrests are free from sauage beasts, and the ground voyd of noysome serpents: in whose stead an infinite multitude of tame cattle there are with their vdders strutting full of milk, and loden with fleeces to the ground. And verily (that which for the vse of our liues wee most esteeme) the daies are therin very long, & the nights neuer without some light, for that those vtmost plaines by the sea side cast and raise no shadowes on high; and the aspect both of sky and starres passeth beyond the bound of the night: yea the very Sunne it selfe, which vnto vs seemeth for to set, appeareth there only to passe by a little, and goe aside.

Panegyricke to Constantius.

In Britain neither excessiue cold of winter nor extreame heat of summer.

Britaine abounding with all plenty of food for mans sustenance and delight.

Britains nights neuer without som light.

And in another, spoken to Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, thus is sayd:

Though Britaine be but a single name, yet surely the States losses haue been manifold in forgoing a Land so plentifull in fruit and grain, so rich in pasturage, so full of mines & veines of metall, so gainfull in tributes and reuenewes, so accommodated with many hauens, and for circuit so large and spacious.

Britaine full of mines of metals.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Iland, hath thus written:

Tu nimio nec stricta gelu, nec sydere feruens,
Clementi cælo temperiéque places.
Cùm pareret Natura parens, variòque fauore
Diuideret dotes omnibus vna locis,
Sepositit potiora tibi, matrémque professa,
Insula sis fœlix, plenáque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid desiderat vsus,
Ex te prouenier, vel aliunde tibi. (Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art
Thy aire a heauenly temper sweetly breath'd:
So pleas'd Dame nature when shee first bequeath'd:
To euery soyle of her rich gifts a part;
Then mother like best choice for thee she sought
Be thou (quoth she) the Blessed Ile of peace.
What euer pleasure yeelds, or wealths increase
Frō thee shal grow, or shal to thee be brought.

Romanes.

(11) And that BRITAINE hath beene taken for those fortunate Ilands whereof the Poets haue imagined a perpetuall spring-time, is certaine by Isacius Tzetzes a Greeke Author of good account. And in Robert of Auesbury wee read, what time Pope Clement the sixt had elected Lewis of Spaine to be Prince of the Fortunate Ilands, raising him powers both in Italy and France, the English Legier Ambassadours that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were so deepely deepely set in the opinion, that this preparation was made against BRITAINE, that they wrote their suspicions conceived, and presently with-drew themselues into England, to certifie the King of these designes. And it seemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the same minde, when (as Matth. Pariſ. writeth) he said, Verè hortus deliciarũ eſt Anglia: verè puteus inexhauſtus eſt: Et vbi multa abundant, de multis multa poſſunt extorqueri, &c. Certes, the Kingdome of England is the very Paradiſe of pleaſures, a well which can neuer be drawn dry: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may bee extorted &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so far transported with a longing desire, as he made great meanes and earnest suit to the King of England (as the layd Author writeth, ad ann. 1250) that he might come into England to see that Country which was euery where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAINE is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so resplendent in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had vouchſafed to faſhion the world round like a ring, as he did like a globe, it might haue beene moſt worthily the onely Gemme therein. Whose Vallies are like Eden: whose Hilles are as Lebanon: whose Springs are as Piſgah: whose Riuers are as Iordan: whose Walles is the Ocean: and whose defence is the Lord IEHOVAH.

Ioſeph bel. Iud. lib. 7. cap. 13.

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monarchy sheweth not onely the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautifull branches into many other Countryes and Kingdomes farre iacent and remote. This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Iland in times past sustained at once no lesse then eleuen Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crownes, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchy of the Saxons seuen Kingdomes, seated on the South of Seuerius his Wall. Two Kingdomes thence had their sites in that Northerne part, and their seuerall Kings of Scots and Picts ruling on both sides the Clude, euen vnto the Deucaledonian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) diuided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Britaines ruling the West part of this Iland beyond the Clawdh Offa, or Offa his Ditch, commonly called VValles.

BRITAINE sustained at once no lesse then 11 Kings commanding great powers.

D. Powell in his Chron. of VVales in Rhodericke the Great.

(13) The Ilands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orcades, and in Ireland at one time fiue Kings raigning together. France also is annexed, and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Prouinces of Syria, subdued by K. Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de-lion. And at this present in the new world of America a Colony of BRITAINES is seated in that part now called VIRGINEA; whereby the borders of our Soueraignes command and most rightfull title may bee inlarged, and the Gospell of Ieſus Chriſt further preached, which no doubt will in time bee imbraced, to the saluation of many, and great honour to the BRITAINES. And that the borders of this most royall Tent haue beene wide spread in former times, White of Basingſtocke is of opinion, who affimeth that the limits of the Britiſh Empire in old time was from the Orcades vnto the Pyrenean Mountaines. And that K. Athelſtan after his conquest of those Northerne parts with that of Denmarke, wrote so his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of K. Edgar for the foundation of the Cathedrall Church at Worceſter, where in likewise he so stiled himselfe. THE NAMES THAT HAVE BEEN ATTRIBVTED VNTO THIS ILAND OF GREAT BRITAINE,

Chapter II.

AS touching the first Inhabitants and original Names of this Iland, things so far cast into the misty darknesse of obscurity and obliuiō, that there is no hope left vs so lately borne to discouer them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being meerely barbarous, neuer troubled themselues with care to transmit their Originals to posterity: neither if they would, could haue done, being without Letters, which only doe preserue and transferre knowledge vnto others. But admit they had letters, yet was it not lawful for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cæsar doth testifie of the Druides, the only wise & learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice & religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the reuolutions of so many ages as are passed, and so many conuersions or euersions of the State. Gildas and Ninius, the Britaines first Historians, confesse plainly, that they had no vnderstanding of the ancient affaires of this Iland but from forraigne Writers; and neither that aboue two hundred and odde yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. At which time Polybius a most graue Writer, and an attendant vpon Scipio, saith, that the Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were vtterly vnknowen; and whatsoeuer was written or reported of them was but a dreame. And therefore vntill such time as the Romane Writers reach foorth their hands to direct vs, wee shall wander as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish vpon former ruines.

(2) Yet let this bee granted, that the Originall names of Countries and Prouinces were first assumed from their possessors, whereof Iosephus in the seuenth chapter of his first Book of Antiquities is a sufficient Witnesse, who in the dispersion of Noahs sons and his nephewes, nameth the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Laish after their father: Iair his Cities that he conquered in the Land of Gilead: and Iudea from Iudah whose King was of him And that this also was the practise of the Gentiles, Perionius doth shew, who sayth that himselfe knew no Nation in the earth, which would not haue their names either from their Prince, Captaine, or King: the example whereof he inserteth, that Spaine was so named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus, and the like.

(3) And accordingly from Samothes the sixt sonne of Iaphet (whom Moses calleth Mesech) the brother of Gomer, and of Iauan, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to haue replenished the Iles of the Gentiles, is brought by some Authors into this Iland the yeere after the generall Floud two hundred fifty and two, where he seated, and gaue Lawes to his people, and left to his posterity the name thereof to be called Samothea, after his owne. But sith the credit of this Samothes & his Samothea ariseth only from a small and new Pamphlet, bearing the name of Berosus the Chaldean, bolstred out vnder a shew of aged Antiquity, and thrust into the World vnder the countenance of the ancient Historian himselfe: I meane not to enforce, seeing my purpose is to expose this most beautifull Iland in her owne beseeming attire, and not deformed by these rotten and patched rags. And of this forged Berosus we haue better cause to upbraid Iohannes Annius his Countenancer & Commenter, then the Egyptian Priests had to twit Solon, in accusing the Grecias, that for History had not attained to the yeeres of a gray head. For it exceeds not much one hundred & twenty yeers since the same Booke first appeared in the World; & then vehemently suspected as fabulous by Lodouicus Viues, and afterwards conuicted by the learned Gasperus Varrerius in a seuerall Treatise, and now vniuersally rejected of all skilfull Antiquaries.

(4) But the name ALBION is better receiued, being found so tearmed of the Grecians

ALBION the name of this Iland so termed by the Grecians.

Grecians in ancient time, as in the Book de Mundo, written to Alexander, and supposed to be Aristotles, Pliny in his Naturall History, Ptolomy, Strabo, and others: yet vp on what ground it should bee so called, there arise many coniectures, Pomponius Mela, Nicolas Perottus, Rigmanus Philesius, Aristotle, & Humfrey Lhuyd, deriue it from Albion Mareoticus a Gyant, & son of Neptune, that conquered (as they say) these Samotheans, and seated himselfe in this Iland the yeere after the Floud three hundred thirty fiue. And if that be true which Perottus and Lilius Giraldus haue written, then may this Albion giue name to this Iland. Notwithstanding, Strabo, Munster, and Frier Bartholmew, will haue it so named, ab albis rupibus, of the rockes and white cliffes appearing towards the coasts of France: which carrieth the more likelihood through the credit of Orpheus a most ancient Poet, who in his Argonauticks (if so be they were his) calleth the Iland next vnto Hibernia, or Hermin, which questionles is this of ours λευκὴν χέρσον, that is, the white Land. And accordingly haue the welsh Poets called it Inis Wen. And this is further confirmed from Cicero, who ter meth these whitish cliffs mirificas moles: as also by the antick Coines of Antoninus Pius and Seuerus the Roman Emperors, wheron BRITAIN is stamped in a womans attire sitting vpon rocks. And the same being chalky, or of a plasterlike substance, Fracastorious supposeth was the cause of the sweating sickenesse, and wherof Albion had the name. Vnlesse some wil deriue it from Alphon, which as Festus saith, doth signifie white in Greek; or Olbion, rich or happy, in regard of the fertility of the soile, wholsome temperature of the Aire, & the rich commodities in the same: either from Alpion for the high situation. But from the Latine albis rupibꝰ it could not be deriued when that language was vnknown to the world. Marianus the Monke, Iohn Rous, Dauid Pencair, & William Caxton, from others more ancient, doe fetch the name therof from Albina the beautiful daughter of Diocleſian King of Syria, who with her sisters thirty in nũber, for the slaughter of their husbands were banished their Country, and without man, oares, or tackles, were committed to the mercy of the Seas, who after many aduenturs, lastly arriued vpon this shore, where they inhabited, and gaue name to this Iland, calling it Albion after the name of their eldest sister: and accompanying with Diuels, brought forth a Progeny of Gyants, if we will beleeue the Legend of this most impudent liar, which is worthily rejected by Badius, Volaterãus, Harding, Bale, Iohn Rous and others. But that the name Albion was both of great acceptance & long continuance, is apparent by the worthy Epitheton of King Edgar the Saxon, who in his Charter for the foundation of the Abbie of Ely hath these words: Ego Edgarus Basileus dilectæ Insulæ Albionis, subditis nobis sceptris Scotorũ, Cumbrorum, & omniũ circumcirca Regionũ, quietapace fruẽs, &c. By which he knitteth the whol Iland together, as Land worthily to be beloued, & calleth it Albiõ.

(5) The next name ascribed vnto this Iland is Britain, and that first found & giuen by the Grecians, who were the first discouerers of these Westerne parts of the world: either from their painted bodies, as their neighbours (if not ancestours) the Gaules were named of their long shaggie haire, or of their rich mettals therein gotten, and thence carried in abundance into other Countries; or from Brute, that with his dispersed Troians conquered it, as he of Monmouth hath translated; or what occasion soeuer I dispute not: only it feares me I shal giue but smal satisfaction to the desirous Reader, of the cause and original of this name, being consorted with so many vncertainties; wherein the further wee follow this intangled threed, the further are we lead into the Labyrinth of ambiguity. But as Plutarch, Liuy, and other Latine Writers haue complained of the many fictiõs & fables of Poets intermingled with the histories of truth, whereby truth it selfe was often made incredible; so we in rehearsing the diuers names of Britannie, and the reasons thereof by sundry Writers alleaged, rest free in our relations, either from impeaching the power of Antiquitie, or approuing those things that are as yet wrapped vp in Times Obliuions, leauing the credit to them that haue left the same vnto vs, and the censure of their opinions to the iudgement of the learned, and those of better experience.

(6) The vulgar receiued opinion, held on with foure hundred yeers continuance, (some few mens exceptions had against the same) is, that this Iland tooke the name of Britannia from Brute the sonne of Syluius, of whom more shall be spoken in the next Chapter for the peopling of this Iland, and from whom some (following a suspected Gildas) doe write the name Britaine: for so doth Hierome, who translating Æthicus that excellent Scythian Philosopher, calleth both this BRITAINE. The Grecians first named this Iland by the name Britaine.

Ieffrey of Arthur.

How this Iland came to haue the name Britannia is very vncertaine.

The fainings of Poets haue bred distrust in many true Histories.

Britaine the name of this Iland thought to take his name from Brute.

this & the Ilands adiacent, Insulas Brutanicas. But besides the many obiections made both by forraine and home-bred Writers, that seeme to make the story of Brute doubtfull, Humfrey Lhuyd a Cambre-Britaine, a learned and diligent searcher of Antiquities, doth confidently deny the name Britaine to bee taken from Brute; and among many other obseruations, makes this an infallible argument, that the letter B. is not the first radicall of that name; and affirmeth boldly, that there is not any British word whose first radicall letter is B. And therefore he will haue it to bee anciently written PRYDCAIN, compounded of two British words, PRYD and CAIN, which signifie (as he saith) Beauty and White; the C. being lost in the latter word, for the more easie pronunciation in the British tongue; and the P. in the former changed into B. by the Latines, for the more gentle and pleasant sounds sake: so that himselfe thinketh, that those learned and expert men in the British tongue, which wrote the Ilands name with B. doe therein rather follow the Latines, then iudging that to bee the true name indeede: for proofe whereof he citeth both ancient Copies and Traditions of their owne old Poets the Bardi, by whom (sayth he) it was vsually called Prydain, as the fittest denomination for so beautifull a Land. But if either colour or commodities were her God-fathers at the font-stone, why was shee not rather named The Palace of Queene Ceres, as old Orpheus termes her; either Insula florum, as it hath beene found written in a very ancient manuscript? And yet to second this his conceited name, I finde recorded by Bishop Cooper, a learned Writer, that which makes for that purpose. At Euychurch (saith hee) two miles from Salisbury, in the digging downe of a wall, a Booke containing twenty leaues of very thicke velome was found, which from the hands of Master Richard Pace, chiefe Secretary to the King, I receiued; but being sore defaced, could reade no one sentence thorow, yet did I well perceiue the word PRYTANIA, (not called so, from the adiuncts White and Beauteous) but rather from the Greeke word Πρυτανεία Prytania, which as he saith, doth signifie mettals. For the Grecians flourishing in wisedome and experience, entred the Ocean, and finding this Iland full of Brasse, Tynne, Lead, Iron, Gold, & Siluer, gaue name thereunto accordingly, and called it Prytania. Thus farre hee. And some in regard of these rich commodities thence brought, will haue it named Britannia, as vpon like occasion Vibius Sequester affirmeth Calabria sometimes to haue beene so called. Others, and those many doe hold a more strange opinion, namely that this Iland was called Britannia of Bretta a Spanish word which signifieth Earth, for that it was separated from the maine land, and, say they, it was once ioyned with the continent of France. Of this opinion are Antonius Volscus, Dominicus Marius Niger, Seruius Honoratus, Virunius, Bodine, Twyne, and Veustegan. But how that name from that separation may bee gathered I vnderstand not: for if it bee granted that this Iland also was cut from the continent (as it is thought all others in the world were) by the violent rage of the vniuersall floud, yet it followeth not that this onely should claime that name, and from that occasion more then any other, or then all of them so diuided & set a part in the maine Ocean. Others there are that would haue the name Britaine to be brought from Britona a Nymph in Greece, daughter to Mars, who (as they say) to auoid the lasciuious intents of Minos, forsooke the country, and passing the seas ariued in this Iland, and by her the name arose: this hath Textor. But I might as well cite Calepine for his Anglia, & Marianus for his Albina, being all fables consorting alike together, and fictions of the same authority that Virgils Dido is. Hesychius deriueth the name Britaine from Britannus the father of Celtice, on whom Hercules begat Celtus the originall of the Celtæ, as Parthenius Nicæus a very ancient author writeth. And Sir Thomas Eliot a learned Knight, draweth the name of this Iland from the Greeke fountaine also, but of other signification, viz. Πρυτανεία, Prutania, by which terme the Athenians signified their Publike reuenues, and yet that is iustly excepted against, seeing that it is a peculiar terme, only to the Athenians, and that the Grecians called this Iland Βριτανεία, not Πρυτανεία. Goropius Becanus in his Originall of Antwerp saith, that the Danes sought here to plant themselues, and so named this Iland Bridania, that is, free Denmarke. And others deriue it from Prutenia a country in Germany. But that both these are fictions it manifestly appeareth, for that this Iland was famous by the name of Britain many hundred yeeres before that either Dania or Prutania were heard of in the world.

Pomponius Lætus

Pomponius Lætus would haue it Briton, and that name giuen it from the Britons in France. Indeed it is probable, that from the Celtes, the old Gaules, our originals descended: but that the name should come of thē, hath no colour of truth, seeing that those Britons came from vs, and not we from them: and in Cæsars time that coast was called Armorica, but this of ours Britaine. Forcatulus deriueth the name thereof from Brithin a drinke, which as Athenæus saith, was vsed among the Greekes. And others will haue it from the Bruty a roaving and stragling people in Italy: both which are accounted but idle conceits, and for no lesse we will leaue them. White of Basingstock will haue the name thereof deriued from an Hebrew word, and Isidore from a word of her own language. Thus then is Britanny burthened with many titles vnder one truth, and these are the ascriptions, causes and exceptions, as far as we are able to gather: all which must giue place to that which is to follow out of the collections and iudicious obseruances of Master Cambden. Whose words I will abridge, and by his good fauour bring to furnish this chapter, the further to satisfie the vnsatisfied Reader.

(7) This then he holdeth for granted, that ancient nations in the beginning had names of their owne: and that after from these the Greekes and Latines by wresting them to the analogie or proportion of their speech, imposed names vpon Regions and countries, which tooke their denominations from their people and in-dwellers. So Iewry was named from the Iewes, Media from the Medes, Persia of the Persians, Scythia of the Scythians, &c. And why not then by the authority of Martial, Iuuenal, Ausonius, Procopius, and in old inscriptions set vp by the Britaines themselues, BRITTA, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTVS, from BRIT, or BRITH, from whom any one being of that Nation might be termed NATIONE BRITTO, as is seene so inscribed in Saint Mary the Round at Rome? The Saxons likewise themselues called the Britaines Bpitas, and Witichindas the Saxon euerie where nameth the Britaines Britæ: so that the word BRIT is doubtlesse the Primitiue, from whence BRITTO is deriued, and from whence the first glimpse of light leading to the word BRITAINE seemeth to appeare. And that all Nations deuised their names of that, wherein they either excelled others, or were knowen by from others, whether in regard of their first founders honor, as the Iones of Iauan, the Israelites of Israel, the Canaanites of Canaan; or whether in respect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations, as the Iberi after the Hebrew Etymologie, because they were Miners; the Heneti because they were stragglers; the Nomades for that they were breeders of cattell; the Almanes for their esteemed valour & manhood; the Frankners for beeing free; the Pannonians, as Dio conceiteth of their coats with cloth-sleeues the Æthiopians of their blacke hue: & the Albanes because they were borne with white haire, for so saith Solinus, that the colour of their heads gaue name vnto the people. Seeing then that these our Ilanders were known & called by a name common to both them and their neighbours, Cimbri or Cumeri, and had no better marke to be distinguished and known from the borderers, then by their custome of painting their bodies, whereof the most approued Authors doe witnesse, as Cæsar, Mela, Pliny, Martial and others, who affirme that the Britaines vsed to colour themselues with woad, called in the Latine glastum (and Glase at this day with them doth signifie blew) what if Ithen should coniecture (saith he) that they were called Britaines from this their painted bodies? For what is thus stained or coloured, in their ancient countrey speech is called BRITH. Neither let this Etymologie of Britaines seeme to be either harsh or absurd, seeing the very words sound alike, and the name also as an expresse image representeth the things which in Etymologies are chiefly required; for Brith and Brit doe passing well accord: And the word Brith among the Britaines, implieth that which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, stained, died, and coloured, as the Latine Poets describe them, hauing their backes pide or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them. From which colours & vse of painting, the ancient Britaines (as he thinketh) had their names, and is yet in vse among the Welsh. But this is certaine, that a Britain is caled in the british tongue BRITH & and as BRITO came of BRITH, so did BRITANNIA, who, as Isidore saith, tooke the name from a word of their own nation: for what time the ancient Greeks (that first gaue name to this Iland) either as rouers or merchants trauelled into other remote and far disioined countries (as Eratosthenes reporteth) learned from the Inhabitants themselues, or els of the Gaules which spake the same language, that this our nation was called Brith and Brithon: They then vnto the word BRITH, added TANIA, which which in the Greek Glossaries betokeneth a REGION, and whereof they made a compound name Βρεττανία, that is, the BRITONS-LAND. And that this is so, the countries also lying in the West part of the world, as Mauritania, Lusitania, and Aquitania, doe sufficiently confirme: for the Grecians being the first Surueiors of those regions, of Mauri, whom Strabo saith, was called Numidia, made Mauritania; of Lusus the sonne of Bacchus, Lusitania, and of Aquis (waters, as Iuo Carnotensis is of opinion) called the country Aquitania: as also Turditania, & Batistania, Prouinces in Spain, might arise from the Turdi, & Basti their possessors. And that this manner of composition is most vsuall in the names of countries we see: For came not Ireland by composition of the Irish word Erim? Did not Angle-terre grow together of an English and French word, and became England? Doth not Francland proceed from a French & Saxon word? Came not Poleland from a Polonian word which with them betokeneth a plaine? & was not Danmarch compounded of Dan and the Dutch word March, which signifieth a bound or limit? Neither haue we cause to wonder at this Greek addition TANIA, seeing that S. Hierome in his questions vpon Genesis, proueth out of most ancient Authors, that the Greekes inhabited along the sea coasts & Isles of Europe thorowout as far as to this our Iland. Let vs read, sayth he Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Sisinius Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Ilands well neere & all the sea coasts of the whol world, to haue beene taken vp with Greek inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus euen to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verily, that the Greeks ariued in this our region, viewed and considered well the site and nature therof, there will be no doubt nor question made: if we obserue what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Tauromenites who was in Britaine in the yeere one hundred and sixty before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inscription vnto Vlysses in Greek letters, erected in Caledonia as Solinus saith, and lastly if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans here, hath deliuered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had euer discouered vnto the Greeks, Britain, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greek ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, yea and related the description thereof vnto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of six dayes sailing beyond Britaine, vnlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who euer told thē of Scandia, Bergos, & Nerigō, out of which men may saile into Thule? And these names seem to haue beene better knowne vnto the most ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. Wherupon Mela testifieth, that Thule was much mentioned & renowned in Greek writers. Pliny likewise writeth thus; Britain an Iland famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of vs. By this meanes therefore, so many Greek words haue crept into the British, French, and withall, into the Belgick or Low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Baysius, and Budæus doe make their vant and glory in this, that their French-men haue bin of old φιλέλληνες, that is, louers and studious of the Greekes, grounding their reasons vpon few French words of that Idiome, which receiue some marks and tokens of the Greek tong: if Hadrianus Iunius ioyeth no lesse, because in the Belgicke words there lie couertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britaines make their boast in whose language many words ther be deriued from the Greeks. Thus farre M. Cambdens iudgement for Britannia.

Which name we find first mentioned by Polybius the Greeks historian, who liued and trauelled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe, about 265. yeers before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenæus a Greeke author of good account, and before the yeere of grace 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that vpon this occasion: King Hiero saith he, framing a ship of such hugenesse and burden as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine mast: which at last with much adoe was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineheard: and by Phileas Tauromenites the Mechanick, conueied into Sicilie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Cæsar say, that Britaine brought forth neither Beech nor Firre, as hee in his fift booke of commentaries affirmes (if by fagus he meane the Beech) seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Iland, and the Firre-trees for masts in the Northwest of Scotland vpon the bankes of the Lough argicke of such great height and thicknesse, that at the roote they beare 28. handfuls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height, they beare at that Britaine called Inſula Cæruli.

(8) Other names hath this Iland beene termed by, and that either by way of note for her ſituation, as Inſula Cæruli, the Iland in the Sea, ſo written in the ſonet or parodia made againſt Ventidius Baſſus, and by Claudian confirmed, whoſe ſides (ſaith he) the azure Sea doth waſh. And in a very ancient manuſcript it is found written, Inſula florum, an Iland of flowers, for the abundance of Graine therein growing: as alſo for her ſubiection to the Romans, hath beene called by Ægiſippus, the Romane World, and by her owne Hiſtorian Gildas, Romania: for being firſt ſubdued by them, the very name of ſeruitude (ſayth he) ſtucke faſt to the ſoile. And Proſper Aquitanicus in expreſſe words calleth it, the Romane Iland, and ſo did the South-ſaiers when the ſtatures of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperours were by lightning ouerthrowne, who prophecied, that an Emperour ſhould ariſe out of their familie, that ſhould ſend a Pro-conſull to the Romane Iland. Vpon the like cauſe of conqueſt & ſubiection we read in Amanus, that what time the Iland had aſſaied a dangerous reuolt in the raigne of Valentinianus the Emperour, Theodoſius as then Gouernour of Britaine, reducing them vnder their wonted obedience, in honor of Valentinianus, cauſed the Iland to bee called VALENTIA, which name notwithſtanding died either with or immediately after the death of the ſaid Emperour.

This Iland Britaine named the Roman Iland.

Amianus Marcel. lib. 28. c. 7.

This Iland named Valentia.

(9) But about the ſame time, when as by Gods decree the Romanes fulneſſe was come to the wane, and the greatneſſe of their glory did abate; by the downe fall of that one Empire, many Kingdomes beganne to ariſe, and to haue their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themſelues,

Many countries ariſe by the Romans downfall.

Among the reſt, this Iland Britaine ſhortly came to be diuided into three ſeuerall Kingdomes, & each of them to retaine an abſolute power in their owne dominions, & were knowne by their ſeuerall and proper names. The firſt was Scotland from Scotia, and that from Scythia, as the beſt ſuppoſe, whoſe Southerne bounds was the famous Wall from Carlile to Newcaſtle, & from thence the enorme tract of all that Northerne promontory was called Scotia, or Scotland. The ſecond was Cambria, of vs called Wales, ſited in the Weſt of this Iland, incloſing thoſe waſte mountaines with a ditch drawen from Baſingwarke in Flint-ſhire in the North, to the mouth of Wye neere Briſtoll in the South, ſo ſeparated by great Offa the Mercian King. And the third was Angle-lond, the Eaſt, the moſt fruitfull, and beſt of the Iland, lying coaſted with the French and Germane Seas, ſo named when the vnited Heptarchie of the Saxons was ruled by King Egbert, who by his edict dated at Wincheſter, Anno 819. commanded the ſame to bee called Angle-lond, according to the name of the place from whence his anceſtors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Iuitland and Holſatia, where to this day the place retaineth the name Engloen. And therefore Calepine is to be reiected, that would haue the name from Queene Angela, and Goropius, of good Anglers; either from Pope Gregory his attribute of Angell-like faces; or from others that would faine it from Angula the Giant-like brother to Danus; or force it from Angulus Orbis.

This Iland Britaine diuided into three kingdomes. The firſt, Scotland, whoſe partitiõ ſouth-ward is from Carlile to Newcaſtle.

The ſecond, Cambria, or Wales, whoſe partition is from Baſingwarke to Wye.

The third, Angle-lond coſted with the French and German Seas.

This Iland named Angle-lond of a place in Denmarke called Englöen.

Gregory 1.

(10) Neither indeede was it called England before the dayes of Canutus the Dane, but with Angle-land, retained ſtill the names both of Albion and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar, the tenth in ſucceſſion from Egbert, and no leſſe then one hundred forty and nine yeeres after this Edict is ſeene, where in the beginning hee ſtileth himſelfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Albionis Baſileus, &c. And in the end of the ſame charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britanniæ Donoconem cum ſigillo S. Crucis confirmaui. And yet vpon his Coines wrote himſelfe Rex Anglis, whereby we ſee the relliſh of the former names not vtterly extinct, though a new was impoſed by the Saxons.

This Iland not called England before the dayes of Canutus the Dane. This Iland vſually called Angle-lond, Albion, and Britain, before Canutus dayes.

CHAPTER III.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that this ILAND with the Vniuerſall was repleniſhed with people immediately after that men began to bee multiplied vpon the earth, euen in the dayes of the former PATRIARKES, and long before the Flood of NOAH, as ſundry ancient Writers haue related. And ſure if wee conſider in thoſe firſt ages of the world the long life of man (the onely meanes to multiplication) and the worlds continuance for one thouſand ſixe hundred fifty and ſix yeeres before it was deſtroied, wee ſhall eaſily yeelde, that euery Country & corner of the earth was plentifully peopled and inhabited. And ſo much doe the Sacred SCRIPTVRES intimate vnto vs, where by the Prophet Iſay it is ſayd: Thus ſayth the Lord, that created heauen; God himſelfe, that framed the earth, and made it: hee hath prepared it; he created it not in vaine, hee formed it to be inhabited.

Iſa. 45. 18.

(2) But when the wrath of GOD was executed vpon the world for ſin, & all ouer-whelmed with a floud of waters the whole earth thereby became altogether vnpeopled, eight perſons onely with the breed-reſerued creatures ſaued in the floting Arke: Whoſe Port or Hauen was the mountaine of Araret, in Armenia; whence with the bleſſing of procreation, mankinde began againe to be multiplied vpon the earth; and from the confuſion of Babels building to bee ſcattered by Tribes and Colonies, according to the diuerſitie of Languages, into diuers parts & Countries of the world, giuing names to the places where they ſeated, according to the names of their Princes or chiefe Commanders. Amongſt whom the ſonnes of Iapheth the eldeſt ſonne of Noah, (whom Moſes declareth to haue peopled the Iſles of the Gentiles) betooke themſelues into Europe, theſe weſterne parts of the world: as Sem did into Aſia, and Cham into Africa: whoſe poſterities accordingly diſperſed, Ioſephus in his firſt Booke of Antiquities hath both branched into their ſeuerall diuiſions, and reduced them to their firſt roots and originals.

who affirme his off-spring to haue inhabited from the Mount Taurus all Europe Northward, so farre as the British Seas leauing names both to places and people. And Gildas, as Nubrigensis witnesseth, and Polydore Virgil granteth, will haue this Iland inhabited euen from the Flood. But of these ancient things, sayth Sebastian Munster, no man can write certainly, it depending onely vpon coniecturals, and the same by heare-say, and flying reports of priuate men, as Origen speaketh.

(4) Gomer then, the eldest sonne of Iapheth, gaue name to the Gomerians, who filled almost this part of the world, leading (as Villichius sayth) in the tenth yeere of Nimrod, a Colonie out of Armenia into Italy, which of Gomer were called Combri, and afterwards Cimbri: whence such as departed Italy went into the North parts and gaue name to Cimbrica Chersonesus: from whence it is certaine wee the English proceede, and of whom also it is likely the Britaines came. For so iudgeth a learned Britain himselfe, who sayth his countrymen the Welsh which are vnlearned, as yet know no other name for their land and people, but onely Cumbri.

(5) And that of these Gomerians, were also the Gaules, learned Clarenceaux that brightest lampe to all Antiquities, out of Iosephus and Zonaras sufficiently hath obserued; who that they were also called Cimbri, he proueth out of Cicero, & Appian Alexandrinus, that those Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gaules, where he sayth C. Marius represt the armies of the Gaules, entring in great numbers into Italy: which, as all Historians witnesse, were the Cimbrians. And the Habergeon of their king Beleus digged vp at Aquæ Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, doth shew the same: whereon was engrauen in strange Characters BELEOS CIMEROS; as also the testimony of Lucan doth no lesse, who calleth the Ruffine hired to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Liuy & Plutarch in the life of Marius affirme to be a Gaule. They also who vnder the conduct of Brennus spoiled Delphi in Greece, were Gaules, as all writers with one voyce agree, and yet that these men were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth testifie. And for Brennus their Grand-Captain, our Historians report him to be a Britain: as likewise Virgil (though in taunting wise) termeth that Grammarian the Britaine Thucydides, whom Quintilian affirmes to be a Cimbrian.

(6) And if of the rest of Noahs nephewes, seated in seuerall countries, the Nations proceeding from them, are knowen by their originall names, as the Turkes of Togorma, whom the Iewes to this day so terme, the Iones from Iauan, the Medes from Madai, the Thracians frō Tiras, and so of the rest, whose names as yet sound not much vnlike to their first plāters; why then shall not we think, that our Britaines or Cumerians, are the very off-spring of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination, the name so neere according? Sith granted it is, that they planted themselues in the vtmost borders of Europe, as Isidore hath said. For the Arke resting in Armenia, and the people thence flowing like waters from the spring, repleniſhed those parts first that lay next their site, as Asia the lesse, and Greece before Italy: Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. And if we consider the occasions that might be offered, either for disburdening the multitudes of people, for conqueſt, desire of nouelties, smalnesse of distance, or commodities of the aire and soile, we may easily conceiue this Iland to haue bin peopled from thence. For it standeth with sense that euery country receiued their first inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather then from them that lay more remote: for so was Cprus peopled out of Asia, Sicile and Candie out of Greece; Corsica and Sardinia, out of Italy, Zeland out of Germany, Island out of Norway, and so of the rest. Now that Britaine had her first inhabitants from Gaule, sufficiently is proued by the name, site, religion, manners & languages, by all which the most ancient Gaules & Britaines haue bin as it were linked together in some mutuall society; as is at large proued by our arch-Antiquary in his famous work, to which I refer the studious Reader.

(7) And although the inner parts of the Iland were inhabited, as Cæsar sayth, of such whom they themselues out of their owne records, report to haue been borne in the Iland: yet the sea coasts were peopled by those, who vpon purpose to make war, had passed thither out of Belgia, and Gaule, who still caried the names of those cities and states, out of which they came: as the Belgæ, the Attrebatij, Parisi, and the like names of people both in Gaule, and in Britaine, that after the warres warres there remained. Which is the more confirmed in that both the Prouinces were gouerned by one & the ſame Prince, as Cæſar in his owne remembrance knew, and nameth one Diuitiacus to hold a good part of Gaule, and alſo of Britaine vnder his gouernment. Yea and Tacitus the moſt curious ſearcher into Britaines affaires, in the life of Agricola thus diſciphereth them. Now (ſayth hee) what manner of men the firſt Inhabitants of Britannie were, forraine brought in, or borne in the land, as among a barbarous people, it is not certainly knowen. Their complexions are different, and thence may ſome coniectures be taken: for the redde haire of the dwellers in Caledonia, and mighty lymmes, import a German deſcent. The coloured countenances of the Silures, and haire moſt commonly curled, and ſite againſt Spaine, ſeeme to induce, that the old Spaniards paſſed the Sea, and poſſeſſed thoſe places. The neereſt to France likewiſe reſemble the French, either becauſe they retaine of the race from which they deſcended, or that in Countries butting together, the ſame aſpect of the heauens doth yeeld the ſame complexions of bodies. But generally it is moſt likely, the French being neereſt did people the Land. In their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions, there is to bee ſeene an apparant conformity. The Language differeth not much: like boldneſſe to challenge and ſet into dangers: when dangers come, like feare in refuſing: ſauing that the Britaines make ſhew of great courage, as being not mollified yet by long peace.

(8) Whereby wee ſee, that theſe Cimbrians (of whom, as Appian Alexandrinus ſayth, came the Celts, and of them the Gaules, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus affirmeth, whith whom both Plato and Ariſtotle agree) were the ancient progenitors of theſe our Britaines: and them, with the Gaules, to bee both one and the ſame people, is allowed by Pliny, that placeth them both in the continent of France; for ſo Euſtathius in his Commentarie vnderſtandeth Dioniſius Afar, that theſe Britaines in Gaule gaue name to the Iland now called GREAT BRITAINE, as Pomponius Latus and Beda before him had done. Theſe things conſidered, with the neernes of their ſites for ready entercourſe, made both Cæſar and Tacitus to conceiue as they did. Neither were theſe things following ſmall motiues vnto thē: for their religion was alike ſayth Lucan and Tacitus: their boldneſſe in warres and manner of armes alike, ſayth Strabo, Tacitus, Dion, Pliny, Herodian, and Mela: Their building alike, ſaith Cæſar & Strabo: their ornaments and manners alike, ſaith Pliny and Cæſar: their wits alike, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus: their language alike, ſayth learned Bodine: and in all things the vnconquered Britaines to the ancient Gaules alike, ſayth Tacitus. And all theſe doe warrant vs (me thinkes) to come from the Cimbrians, whoſe ſonnes, and our fathers, were the Celts and Gaules: the bands of whoſe amities were ſo linked together, that the Britaines gaue aide, and aſſiſted the Gaules againſt Cæſar, which was no ſmall cauſe of his quarrell againſt them.

(11) The last, but much applauded opinion, for the possessing and peopling of this Iland, is that of Brute, generally held for the space of these last foure hundred yeeres (some few mens exceptions reserued) who with his dispersed Troians came into, and made conquest of this Iland the yeer of the worlds creation 2887. and after the vniuersall floud 1231. in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the land of Israel, & before the incarnation of Christ our Sauiour one thousand fifty nine. This Brute is brought from the ancient Troians by descent, yea and from the persons of the heathen deified gods: as that he was the sonne of Syluius, who was the sonne of Ascanius, the sonne of Æneas, the sonne of Anchises by Venus the Goddesse, and daughter to Iupiter their greatest in account. And if Pliny and Varro hold it praise-worthy to challenge descents (though falsly) from famous personages, whereby, as they say, appeareth an inclination to vertue, and a valerous conceit to perswade vnto honor, as sprung from a race diuine and powerfull: then by all meanes let vs listen to him of Monmouth, who hath brought his Nation to ranke in degree with the rest of the Gentiles, which claime themselues to be the Generation of the gods.

(12) But why doe I attribute the worke to him as the Author, sith he professeth himselfe to be but the translator of that history out of the British tongue, which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford brought out of Normandy, and deliuered vnto him? For the further confirmation thereof, and more credit to his story, Henry of Huntington, who liued in the time of King Stephen, and wrote likewise the history of this land, bringeth the line of Brute from Æneas the Troiane, and his arriuage and conquest to happen in the time of Heli his Priesthood in the land of Israel, as Geffrey ap Arthur hath also done: not taking (as some thinke) any thing thereof from him, but rather out of an ancient booke intituled De Origine Regum Britannorum, found by himselfe in the library of the Abbey of Bec, as he trauelled towards Rome: which history began at the arriuall of Brute, and ended with the acts of Cadwallader, as by a treatise of his owne inditing, bearing the same title, hath been compared, and found in all things agreeing with our vulgar history, as industrious Lamberd affirmeth himselfe to haue seen. And Ninius is said by the writer of the reformed history, to bring these Britaines from the race of the Troianes, foure hundred yeeres before that Geffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninius also, Talieſin, a Briton Poet in an Ode called Hanes, os Taieſſ his course of life, in these words, Mia deythymyma at Weddillion Troia, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

(13) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the dayes of King Henry the first) was before him of Monmouth, is most certaine; yet doth he make mention of Arthur a Prince (saith he) deseruing rather to be aduanced by the truth of records, then abused by false imputation of fables; being the onely prop and vpholder of his country. And Beda, his ancient also, nameth Ambrosius Aurelianus to be King of the Britaines, long before that Geffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Liuy, Bellinus, (if he be Belgius) by Iustine; Cassibelan by Cæsar; Cunobilin by Suetonius; Aruiragus by Martial; Lucius by Eusebius, Coel, Constantius, Carausius, and others by Eutropius, and Paulus Diaconus; and Helena by Nicephorus, Ambrose and Socrates. These are the affirmatiues that giue countenance to the Archdeacon of Monmouths translation, and credit to Brutes conquests and successours; yea & Iohn Harding his Herauld, in his home-spun poetry, can easily emblaze his armes to be Gules, charged with two lyons rampant endorsed Ore; and the same to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner displaied at his entrance is said to be Vert a Diana of gold fitchel, crowned, and inthronized, the same that Æneas bare, when he entred the land of the Latines. But the censures of these relations I leaue to the best liking of iudicious Readers, only wishing them to be vnlike the inhabitants vnder the rockes of the Cataracts of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Varro.

(14) First (with a reuerend reseruation had to the sacred histories) Varro the most learned Latine Writer, diuiding times motions into three seuerall parts, that is, from the creation to the flood, which he termeth altogether vncertaine: from the flood to the first Olympiad (by Beroaldus computation set in the yeere of the world 3154. and thirty one of the raigne of Ioas, king of Iudah: seuen hundred seuenty and foure yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour) he calleth fabulous: and the last age from the first Olympiad to himselfe, he nameth historicall. Now the story of Brute beginning two hundred sixty seuen yeeres before the first Olympiad, falleth in the time wherein nothing else is related, either of the Greekes or Latines, the onely learned writers, but fables and tales, as both himselfe and others haue told vs, much more then, among the barbarous, vnlettered, and vnciuill nations, as all these parts of the world then were.

Times motions diuided into three parts. Beroaldus.

The third only historicall. The story of Brute fabulous.

Gildas.

(15) Whereupon Gildas our ancienteſt home-borne writer, (cited and in whole sentences followed by venerable Beda, who termeth him the Britaines historiographer) in this of Brute is silent, and in his lamentable passions neuer dreames of him, but as one ouerwhelmed with griefe, bewaileth the wickednesse of the time wherein he liued, who was born, as himselfe sayth, in the forty fourth yeere after the Saxons first entrance, about the yeere of Christs incarnation 493. and died as Bale citeth out of Polydore, the yeere of our redemption 580. Ninius also another ancient writer, who liued aboue eight hundred yeeres since, taking in hand the Chronicles of the Britaines, complaineth that their great Masters & doctors could giue him no assistance, being ignorant of skill, and had left no memoriall of things passed, nor cõmitted their acts vnto writing, whereby hee was inforced to gather what hee had gotten from the annals and Chronicles of the holy fathers. Beda likewise, whose history ended in anno 733, beginneth no sooner then with Iulius Cæsars entrance; notwithstanding he had the assistance of the Abbat Albinus, who was brought vp vnder Theodorus Archbishop of Canterbury, and had begunne the history of this land with most diligent search from the records of the kingdome of Kent, and the prouinces adioyning; as also being further assisted by Daniel Bishop of the West-Saxons, who sent him all the records that were to be found of the same Bishoprick, South-Saxons, and the Ile of Wight. The like helps had he from Abbat Esius, for the country of East-Angles; from Cymbertus and the brethren of Læstinge for the prouince of Mercia & East-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lindisfarnum, for the country of Northumberland; besides his owne paines for collections, knowledge and experience: all which hee did disgest and historically compile, and before the publication thereof sent it to King Ceolulphe at that time raigning in Northumberland, to bee approued or corrected by his most learned skill: yet in none of these found hee that history of Brute nor his successors, which as some would haue it, was then vnbegotten in the world.

(16) After him Elward, as William of Malmsbury calleth him, or rather (as he writeth himselfe) Patricius Consul fabius Quæstor Ethelwerdus, a diligent searcher of antiquities, a reuerend person, and of the bloud royall, wrote foure bookes, briefly comprising the whole history of England, frõ the beginning of the world vnto the time of King Edgar, wherein he liued; of Brute nor his Britaines speaketh a word; but passeth with silence to the Romanes and Saxons. What need I to cite Ingulphus, who died anno 1109. Florentius of Worcester, that flourished in the dayes of King Henry the first, or William of Malmsbury, that wrote vnto the end of his raigne; all of them writers before Geffrey of Monmouth, but none of them mentioning this story of Brute. This moued William of Newbourgh, borne (as himselfe saith) in the beginning of King Stephens raign, and liuing at one and the same time with this Archdeacon of Monmouth, too too bitterly to inueigh against him and his histoy, euen so soone as the same came forth: as in the proeme of his booke is to be seene. And that the words are his & not our owne, take them from him as they lie. In these our dayes (saith he) there is a certaine writer risen vp deuising fictions and tales of the Britaines, out of the vaine humors of his owne braine, extolling them far aboue the valorous Macedoni-

But I know the answer to this so great an accusation: namely, that this William making sute vnto Dauid ap Owen Gwyneth Prince of North Wales, for the Bishoprick of Saint Assaphs, after the death of Geffrey, and thereof failing, falsly scandalized and impudently belied that most reuerend man. Which surely had beene a great fault, and might of vs be beleeued, had not others of the same ranke and time, verified asmuch.

A deuice to put by this William of Newburghs accusation.

(17) For Sylvester Giraldus, commonly called Cambrensis, that flourished in the same time with the said author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous story of Geffrey. The like is verified by Iohn Weathamstead Abbat of Saint Albanes, a most iudicious man that wrote in anno 1440. who in his Granarie giueth sentence of this history as followeth. The whole discourse of Brutus (saith he) is rather poeticall, then historicall, & for diuers reasons is built more vpon opinion then truth; first because there is no mention thereof made in the Romane story, either of his killing his father, or of the said birth, or yet of banishing the sonne. Secondly, for that Ascanius begat no such son who had for his proper name Syluius, by any approued Author: for according to them, he begat one onely sonne, and his name was Iulius, from whom the family of the Iulij took their beginning. And thirdly, Syluius Posthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth; was the sonne of Æneas by his wife Lauinia, and he begetting his sonne Æneas in the thirty eight yeer of his raigne, ended his life by course of naturall death. The kingdom therfore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will haue, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Syluius. Wherfore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble bloud, & yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood only that enobleth a nation; and it is the mind also with perfect vnderstanding, and nothing els, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therfore Seneca writeth in his Epistles to Plato, that ther is no King but he came from vassals, and no vassal but he came from Kings. Wherfore to conclude, let this suffice (saith he) that the Britaines from the beginning of their nobility haue bin couragious and valiant in fight that they haue subdued their enemies on euery side, and that they vtterly refuse the yoke of seruitude.

(18) Now that William of Newborough, had sufficient cause (say some) to exclaime against the fantacies of Merline, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifest in the sequel, not onely by the decree of that obtruded Councel of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication, of Merlines bookes; but also (in effect) by the statute enacted the fift yeere of our last deceased Queene Elizabeth of blessed and immortall memorie, wherein is forbidden such fantasticall predictions, vpon occasions of Armes, Fields, Beasts, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, such as Merline stood most vpon; and likewise William of Malmesbury saith, that Arthur being the onely proppe that vpheld his country, deserued rather to bee aduanced by truth, then abused with fables wherewith that story is most plentifully stored. And also, that Weathamstead had reason to account Brutes acts and conquests, to bee rather poeticall then any waies warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the silence of the Romane writers, therein, who name neither Brute nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings: and if any such were (say the contradictors) how could they be ignorant of the vntimely death of their king, slaine by the hand of his naturall (though in this act vnnaturall) sonne? or what should moue them, being so lauish in their own commendations, to be thus silent in their Brutes worthinesse, that with seuen thousand dispersed Troians warred so victoriously in Gallia, conquered a kingdome of Giants; subdued a most famous Iland, raigned gloriously, and left the same to his posterity; none of them, either in prose or poetry once handled

(19) Yea, and there are ſome Criticks that faine would take aduantage from the defenders of Brutes hiſtory themſelues, as from Sir Iohn Prys, that produceth many vncertain enſamples of the originall of other nations; which granted (ſay they) doth no wayes confirme the truth or certainty of our owne, neither is it any honour to deriue theſe Britaines from the ſcumme of ſuch conquered people as the Troianes were. Humfry Lhuyd likewiſe denying abſolutely the deriuatiõ of the Britaines name from Brute, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as we haue ſaid) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conqueſt of this Iland to their vnderſtanding, as alſo the catalogue of his ſucceſſors, which are ſaid to raigne ſucceſſiuely for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another induſtrious Britiſh writer, hauing the help of two moſt ancient Britiſh copies, the collections of Caradock of Carnaruan, their owne Bardies euery third-yeeres viſitation, and twenty ſeuen authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) beſides his helpes had in the offices of records for this realme; yet aſcending no hier then to the perſon of Cadwallader Prince of Wales, whoſe raigne was in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation 682. and no leſſe then one thouſand ſeuen hundred twenty and ſixe yeeres, after that Brute is ſaid to come into this Iland, doth not warrant (ſay they) the ſtory that is included betwixt, but rather euen the ſame is interlaced with many doubtfull vncertainties, and ſo left diſputable by the ſaid compiler himſelfe; as namely whether that this Cadwallader whom the Britaines claime to be their king, be not the ſame Chedwald whom the Saxons would haue theirs; both liuing at one time, both in acts alike, and names neere, both abandoning their kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, nay, ſay they, in one Sepulchre. The like hee bringeth of the Britaines Iuor, and the Saxons Iue, in the like coherences of names, acts, deuotions, and deaths: ſo that this hiſtory of Brute carrieth not ſo ſmooth a current for paſſage as is wiſhed, nor is that Gordions knot ſo eaſily vnlooſed.

Thus farre Iohn Lewis: and for the exceptions made againſt Brute: wherein I haue altogether vſed the words of others; and will now (without offence, I hope) adde a ſuppoſall of mine owne, ſeeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the onely touch-ſtone to the truth of hiſtories, eſpecially ſuch as are limited by the bounds of the ſacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the ſame cannot bee ſo ancient (ſuppoſing it were neuer ſo certaine) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumſtance of time, to my ſeeming ſufficiently doth prooue.

The Authors owne opinion of Brutes hiſtory.

(20) For Brutes conqueſt and entrance are brought by his Author to fall in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Prieſthood in the Land of Iſrael, and ſo is faſtned into a computation that cannot erre Now the eighteenth yeere of Helies gouernment, by the holy Scriptures moſt ſure account, is ſet in the yeere of the worlds creation 2887. after the vniuerſall floud 1231. and before the birth of our bleſſed Sauiour 1059. yeeres. Brute then then liuing in this fore-said time, was foure deſcents from the conquered Troians (as hee of Monmouth had laid downe) which were Æneas, Aſcanius, Syluius, and himſelfe: ſo that by theſe generations ſucceſſiue in order, the very yeere almoſt of Troyes deſtruction may certainely bee pointed out and knowen, which in ſearching hath beene found ſo doubtfull, that by ſome it hath beene thought to be a meere fable. Yet with more reuerence to antiquity obſerued, let vs caſt and compare the continuance of theſe foure generations vnto Brutes Conqueſt, not ſhortening them with Baruch, to be but ten yeares to an age: neither lengthning them with Ioſephus, who accounteth one hundred and ſeauenty yeeres for a generation: but with more indifferency let vs with Herodotus, who wrote neerer theſe times, alow thirty yeeres for a ſucceſſion, as hee accounteth in his ſecond booke. Now foure times thirty maketh one hundred and twenty, the number of yeeres that theſe foure Princes ſucceſſiuely did liue: by which computation likewiſe meaſured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirty eight yeere of Gideons gouernment in Iſrael, and was the yeere after the worlds creation 2768. But the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, alledged out of Meander Pergamenus, and Letus, deſtroieth that time of Troies deſtruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirty yeeres after, euen in the raigne of King Solomon: for in his firſt booke Stromaton thus he writeth: Menelaus, from the ouerthrow of Troy came into Phœnicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyrus gaue his daughter in mariage vnto Salomon King of Iſrael. Where, by him we ſee that Troies ruines and Salomons raigne fell both vpon one time. And ſo Brute hath loſt of his antiquity, by this account, 230. yeers; and entred not in Helies Prieſthood, but rather in the vſurpation of Iudahs Kingdome by Athalia, and in the yeere of the world 3118.

(21) To whom let vs ioine Ioſephus, an Author of great credit, & without ſuſpicion in this caſe, who in his Nations defence againſt Appion, in both his bookes, confidently affirmeth himſelfe able to proue by the Phœnician Records of warrantable credit, that the City Carthage was built by Dido, ſiſter to Pigmalion, one hundred fifty and fiue yeeres after the raigne of King Hiram, which was Salomons friend, and one hundred forty three yeeres, and eight moneths after the building of his moſt beautifull Temple. Now wee know by Virgil, from whom all theſe glorious tales of Troy are told, that Carthage was in building by the ſame Dido at ſuch time as Æneas came from Troies ouerthrow, through the Seas of his manifold aduentures. If this teſtimony of Ioſephus be true, then fals Troies deſtruction about the twentieth yeere of Ioas raigne ouer Iudah, which was the yeere of the worlds creation 3143. whereunto if we adde one hundred and twenty yeeres for the foure deſcents before ſpecified, then wil Brutes conqueſt of this Iland fall with the twelfth of Iothams raigne in the Kingdome of Iudah, which meets with the yeere of the worlds continuance 3263. And ſo hath he againe loſt of his antiquity no leſſe then 375. yeeres.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes ſtory, and to ſet the time, in a point ſo vncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be truely drawen; Manethon the Hiſtorian Prieſt of Egypt, in his ſecond booke cited by Ioſephus, affirmeth that the Iſraelites departure from Egypt was almoſt a thouſand yeeres before the warres of Troy. If this be ſo (as it ſeemeth Ioſephus alloweth it ſo) and one hundred & twenty yeeres more added, for the foure deſcents aboue mentioned, the number will fall about the yeere of the worlds creation 3630. long after the death of Alexander the Great and Greeke Monarch. By which account the great ſuppoſed antiquity of Brute, is now leſſened by ſeuen hundred fifty and two yeeres; and the time ſo ſcantelized betwixt his and Cæſars entrance, that two hundred forty ſix yeeres onely remaine: a time by much too ſhort for ſeuenty two Princes, which ſucceſſiuely are ſaid to raigne each after-others, & from Brute to Cæſar recorded to haue ſwaied the regall Scepter of this Iland.

(23) But vnto theſe obiections I know the anſwer will be ready; namely the diuerſities of Scriptures account, being ſo ſundry and different, that the ſtory of Brute cannot thereby bee touched, but ſtill ſtandeth firme vpon it ſelfe. Indeed I muſt confeſſe, that from the firſt Creation, to the yeere of mans Redemption, the learned Hebrues, Greekes, and Latines, differ much, and that not only each from others, but euen among themſelues ſo farre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by theſe ſeuerall

And yet doe these disagreements helpe little the Obiectors if this be considered, that the maine foundation of these diuersities consisteth chiefly in the first world before the Flood, wherein it is manifest, that the reputed Septuagint addeth to the Hebrew Originall fiue hundred eighty and six yeeres. And from the Flood to Abrahams birth, is accounted eight hundred and fifty yeeres more then Moses hath. As likewise the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captiuity of Babylon to the death of Christ, one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres are added more then the Sunnes course hath measured: so that it seemeth the differences were not g reat for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whose raignes Brute is brought to people, and possesse this Iland. But leauing these diuersities, and to come to a certainty, let vs calculate, the yeeres of the holy history according as Functius, Beroaldus. and sundry other Theologike Chronologers haue done, who from the Scriptures most sure account, so tye the stories of times together, that like to a golden chaine, the linkes are fastned each to other, and the whole so compleate, that a yeere is not missing from the fall of man, vnto the full time of his redemption.

These differences were chiefly before the Flood. Septuagint.

Ioseph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7.

Functius. Beroaldus.

The accounting of yeeres by the Scripture is a most sure manner of computation.

(24) First then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeeres 1656. gathered by a triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is thence obserued for foure hundred twenty and seuen yeeres that is, to the seuenty fifth of Abrahams life, wherein God began to tie the times accounts in holier summes: for Terah, the first recorded Idolater, was the last in honour that had the Sunnes course measured by mans life. And now the bonds of time tie the Promise to Abraham, to bee before the Law foure hundred and thirty yeeres, as the Apostle to the Galathians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Salomons Temple, and that in the fourth yeere of his raigne, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty: and from that foundation, to his death, were thirty six yeers: for his whole raigne was forty. From his death and Kingdomes diuision, vnto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeers three hundred and ninety, as by the dayes of Ezekiels siege and sleepe appeareth in the second and fifth verses of his fourth chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captiuity, were yeeres fifty and one, for the whole time of Babels bondage contained seuenty yeeres, as Ieremy 25. 11. whereof nineteene were expired; and fifty one remaining vnto the first yeere of Cyrus their deliuerer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his anointed, Isay 45. 1. In the first yeer of whose Monarchy he published an Edict for the returne of the Iewes and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is seene. Britaines may more truely deriue their descent from Troy by the Romanes.

(25) Lastly, if from among these mysty clouds of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that we will needs haue our descents from the Troians; may wee not then more truely deriue our blood from them through the Romans, who for the space of foure hundred threescore and six yeeres were planted amongst vs? in which continuance it is most certaine, they toooke of our women to bee their wiues, & gaue their women to bee wiues vnto vs, seeing that some of their Emperors did the like themselues, and from whose blood, saith Beda, the Britaine Ambrosius lineally descended. And if beauty and parts bee the instigatours vnto loue, as in the first world we see it was, no doubt then the features of the Britaines, were moouing Angels vnto the Romanes, whose faces euen in those times were accounted to be angelicall, and whose personages as yet, are respected as the best (if not better) then any other in the world. But that the Romans themselues descended from the Troians, or Æneas should be the roote of the Iulian family, howsoeuer the fictions of Poets as a spring-tide haue flowed from the fulnesse of their pens, yet Tacitus their best writer, accounteth those things not far vnlike to old fables, wherein he iudgeth that Nero to win credit before the Consuls, and to get reputation in the glory of eloquence, vndertooke the pleading of the Ilienses cause, declaring the Romanes descent from Troy: and the Iulij from the loines of Æneas, which notwithstanding he censureth as is said. And Iosephus in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and families, affirmeth that Romus was the Originall of the old Romanes, and he of Chus, and Cham, if he meane as he speaketh. To conclude; (by what destiny I know not) nations desire their originals from the Troians, yet certaine it is, that no honour from them can bee brought, whose City and fame stood but for six descents, as vnder the raignes of Dardanus, Erichthonius, Tros, Ilus, Laomedon, and Priamus, during which time they were thrice vanquished; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time rased by the rage of the Grecians in the raigne of King Priamus, and the Troians themselues made as it were the scum of a conquered people. And therefore as France hath cast off their Francio King Priamus his sonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharoes daughter, Denmarke their Danus, Ireland their Hiberus, and other Countries their Demi-gods; so let BRITAINES likewise with them disclaime their BRVTE, that bringeth no honour to so renowned a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glorie in the murders of his parents, and imbaseth their descents, as sprung from Venus that lasciuious Adultereresse: of whom saith du Plessis, I am ashamed that the heathen were not ashamed of this shamefulnesse; but much more that Christians blush not to name her in their verses.

THE MANNERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT BRITAINES.

CHAPTER IIII.

HAuing thus farre spoken of the ancient Names of this famous ILAND, and of the Nations acknowledged to be the first Planters and Possessors thereof; it remaineth that somewhat bee mentioned of the Manners and Customes of those people and times, though not so pleasing or acceptable as were to bee wished, for that the clouds of ignorance and barbarous inciuility did then shaddow and ouerspread almost all the Nations of the earth: wherein I desire to lay imputation no further then is sufficiently warranted by most authentike Writers: and first from Cæsar, who formost of all the Romanes discouered and described our ancient Britaines.

(2) Touching their persons: All the Britains (saith Cæsar) vsed to die themselues with woad, which setteth a blew colour vpon them, and that maketh them more terrible to behold in Battle. But Pomponius Mela therein

Pliny also addeth another ornament, and saith that the Britains wore rings on their middle finger. The Britaines would not be clad, because they would shew the gay paintings of their bodies. Pliny.

Oribasius calleth that herbe Vitrum; and the Britaines call that colour, glasse: whence our English word glaile (called also Vitrum in Latine) may seeme to bee taken, by reason of the colour thereof, Dio Nicæus.

therein moueth a doubt. They died their bodies (sayth he) with woad; but whether to make a gallant shew, or for what other cause else is vncertaine. And yet Herodian herein absolutely determineth, where he saith that the Britaines knew no vse of garments at all, but about their wastes and neckes wore chaines of iron, supposing them a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth: and their bare bodyes they marked with sundry pictures representing all manner of liuing creatures, and therefore they would not bee clad, for hiding the gay paintings of their bodyes. To which painting Pliny also agreeth, and describeth that hearbe woad, to be like to the Plantine in Gallia, naming it Glastum, with the iuyce whereof (sayth he) the women of Britaine, aswell wiues as young women, annoint and dye their bodies all ouer: resembling by that tincture the colour of the Æthyopians, in which manner they vse at solemne feasts and sacrifices to goe all naked. And Dio Nicæus out of the epitome of Xiphilinus sayth, that the custome of that Nation was to abide in tent all naked and vnshod. Notwithstanding, Cæsar doth elsewhere report, that they clad themselues in leather, which perchance is meant of the ciuiller sort of them, and in time of battell. Solinus likewise speaking of the Britains, sayth, their Country is peopled partly with Barbarians, who by meanes of artificial incisions of sundry forms, haue from their childhood diuers shapes of beasts incorporate vpon them; and hauing their markes deepely imprinted within their bodies, looke how their growth for stature, so do these pictured characters likewise increase. Neither doe these sauage Nations repute any thing a greater testimony of their patience, then by such durable skars to make their lims drinke in much painting & colour. These skarres by Tertullian are tearmed Britannorum stigmata, The Britaines markes. And vnto this skie-colour, or blewish dyings, it seemeth Martiall had relation in his praises of Lady Claudia.

Claudia, cæruleis cum sit Rufina Britannis,
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet? (race,
Sith Claudia comes of azur'd Britains whence comes her minde so deckt with Roman grace?

And of this vse of painting, as our great Antiquary judgeth; both the Britains had their primitiue deriuation, and the Picts (a branch of British race) a long time after, for that their accustomed manner, were called Picti by the Romanes, that is, the painted people.

(3) The haire of their heads, sayeh Cæsar, they let grow, and wore long, which naturally was curled, and of colour yellow (as in the Panegyricke Oration ascribed to Mamertinus, & spoken in praise of Maximianus, is to be seene) all other parts of their bodies being shauen, sauing onely the head and vpper lip. Yet their complexions were much different, as by Tacitus wee see, who auoucheth, that some of those Ilanders were red of haire, as the Calydonians in the Northern Promontories; the haire of the Silures coloured and curled, like to the old Spaniards; and those neerest vnto Gallia resembled their complexions, though not altogether so yellow, saith Strabo. But their wit by Tacitus is preferred before them, and their statures more tal, as Strabo affirmeth, whose lineaments shewed a good making of body; & measurable proportion in all parts answerable. Their women faire, and of exceeding good features, as is described by the Romane Writers. Such was Boudicea, sayth Xiphilinus; Claudia and Helena, sayth Martial & Entropius.

(4) That the strength of nature wrought long in the Britaines, we read out of Plutarch, who reporteth that the people liued one hundred and twenty yeeres, for that, saith he, their cold & frozen Country kept in their naturall heate: whose conditions by Diodorus Siculus are commended to be plaine & vpright, far from the wilinesse & craft of the Romans. And by Strabo their dispositions are partly resembled to the Gaules, but yet, somewhat more rude and plaine; and those most ciuill, who were the inhabitants of Kent, by reason of their oftner cõuersing with other Nations, as Cæsar sheweth. But the farther in the continent, the more rude, and lesse acquainted with other kind of riches besides cattel, as Pomponius Mela affirmeth.

(5) Now touching their domesticke matters. Their buildings were many, & like to them of the Gaules sayth Iulius Cæsar; notwithstãding they giue the name of Towns to certaine cumbersome woods, which they haue fortified with rampires and ditches, whither, they retreat, and resort to eschue the inuasions of their enemies. Which stand them in good stead, sayth Strabo, for whẽ they haue by felling of trees, mounted, and fenced there with a spacious round plot of ground; there they build for thẽselues houses and cottages, and for their cattell

(6) Their wines were ten or twelue a peece, as Cæsar hath alleaged, which they held cõmon among brothers & parents, yet the issue reputed his, who first maried the mother when she was a maid, and Dio indeed affirmeth no lesse, adding withall, that the children thus begotten, were fostred and brought vp in common among thẽ. And Eusebius likewise testifieth, that many Britaines together kept one wife in common to them al. This communitie in mariage moued Iulia the Empresse of Seuerus, to twit the wife of Argetecaxus, that the fashiõ of the women of Britaine in accompanying with men, was very impudent; to whom she replied & said, we British women doe indeed herein differ from you Roman Ladies; for we satisfie our appetite by accompanying with the worthiest men, and that openly, but you with euery base fellow, in a corner.

(6) For their dyet; it was a hainous matter with them to eate either Hen, Hare, or Goose, saith Cæsar, which notwithstanding they bred for their pleasures; neither fed daintily at full and rich tables, as Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, but rather in necessity could liue vpon barkes and roots of trees, and with a kinde of meat no bigger then a beane, after which for a good time they did neither hunger nor thirst, sayth Dio Niceus: who likewise testifieth, that the Britaines did till no ground, neither eat fish, though their riuers thereof bee plenteously stored, but liued vpon prey, venison, and fruits: to which also Cæsar addeth milke, whereof (sayth Strabo) they had not then skill to make cheese. And according to Solinus, their vsuall drinke was made of barley. But for tillage, Pliny seemeth to contradict Dio, affirming that the Britaines manured their grounds with Marle in stead of dung; which argueth no such simplicity in gardning, planting, and in other like points of husbandry as Strabo doth taxe them with. And this foresaid temperance of dyet differeth much from that which Saint Hierome chargeth their neighbours the Anthropophagi of Ireland, who vsed to feed on the buttocks of boyes, and womens paps, as their most dainty and delicate dish.

(8) For their religion, or rather diabolicall superstition, it was as the rest of the world (some few excepted) when Satan had clouded the truth of Gods doctrine, by the foggy mysts of confused darkenesse. For Tacitus makes their superstitions and ceremonies to bee the same in conformity with the Gaules. And what that was, Dio Cassius in his Nero, and Solinus in his history doe declare; who doe ascribe to them the most inhumane offering of mans flesh in their sacrifices: And besides their ancient Idols, such as Dis, Iupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like, they worshipped Andate for their goddesse of Victory, vnto all which they performed no small adorations and honors, imputing their prosperities vnto them: vnto whom also they erected temples with such magnificence as they then had; whose walls, as it seemeth, long after remained. whereon some of those prophane portraitures with deformed lineaments were seene by mournfull Gildas, carrying a sterne and grim conntenance, after the wonted heathenish manner: here see we (sayth he) vpon these desert walles, the vgly features of the Britains Idols, meerely diabolicall, and in number almost exceeding those of Ægypt. So by Tacitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentils, which was that they sought for the direction of their gods by the looking into the entrals of Beasts, yea and of men too; and that they honoured the Altars of their gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captiue in wars. And Plinie writing of Magick, sayth, that in his dayes the art thereof in Britaine was highly honoured, and all the people thereunto so much deuoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to bee performed, that a man would thinke the Persians had learned all their Magick skill from them, Priests, and instructers had they, whereof the chiefe were called Druides, whose office was inployed about holy things, sayth Cæsar; for they had the managing of publike and priuate sacrifices, and to interpret & discusse matters of religion. Vnto them do resorrt great numbers of young men to learne at their hands, and they be had in great reuerence. For they determine almost all controuersies, and matters in variance, aswel publike as priuate. And if there happen any thing to be done amisse, amisse, if there be any murther committed, if there arise any controuersie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, & award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, bee hee priuate person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their judgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grieuous. They that are so excõmunicated, are accounted in the number of the wicked, and vngracious: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communication, lest by conuersing with them, they should defile themselues and receiue harme. If they demand law, they may not haue it: neither may they enioy any place of honor. Ouer all those Druides, there is one Primate, which hath chiefe authoritie ouer them. When he is dead, if there bee any of the rest that excelleth in worthinesse, hee succeedeth: or if there bee any equall, he is chosen by voices of the rest, and diuers times they striue for the soueraignty by force of armes.

Excommunication of great force in the time of the ancient Britaines.

Among the Druides one Primate and chiefe ouer the rest.

These men at a certaine season of the yeere, in the borders of the Carnutes (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) do sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as haue any controuersies: and looke what is decreed and iudged by them, that they stand vnto. This order of discipline is thought to haue had beginning in Britaine, and from thence to haue beene brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, do commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides customably are exempted from the wars, neither doe they pay taxes and tallages with other folke: for they are priuiledged as from the wars, so from all other burthẽs. Allured with so great rewards, many euen of their own accord, do register themselues in that order, and diuers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it commeth to passe, that diuers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither doe they thinke it lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in all other things, for their accounts, as well publike as priuate, they vse the Greek letters.

They assemble once a yeare at a place in France to hear controuersies.

Here appeareth that Academies were then amongst the Britains, & from their example deriued into other Countries.

They are exempted from war.

Their schollers must learn a great many verses by hart.

This order they seeme, in mine opinion (saith he) to haue taken for two considerations: partly because they will not haue their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learn, trusting too much to their books, should haue the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well neere to most men, that vpon trust of the helpe of their booke, they are slacker in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chiefest things that they labour most to beat into mens minds, that the Soules die not, but doe after death passe from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should bee most stirred vnto vertue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispute many other things: as of the stars, and their oft mouings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength & power of the gods immortall: and doe there in instruct the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

Their Theology is, that the soule dieth not, but passeth from one to another.

Their natural Philosophy.

Of their commerce and traffick

(9) These Britaines being meerely barbarous, as most of the Western parts of the world then were, liued priuatly to them-

themselues with scarce any commerce, or entercourse with any other nation: neither indeed were much known to forraine people for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greeke writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres about the yeere of the worlds creation 3720. and two hundred and nine before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to be plenteously stored with Tynne: but of other things therein is silent, saying that all those parts which lay betwixt Tanais and Narbor bending Northward, in his dayes were vnknown and vncertaine, and therefore the reporters of them hee held as dreamers. So doth Cambden another Polybius, account it a prodigall humor of crdulitie, to be perswaded that Himilco sent from the state of Carthage to discouer the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should war in this Iland, because Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth booke saith, that he was inclosed within the streets of Britaine, which place is mistaken for the Brutij in Italy: or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cedrenus say so, seeing all other writers are against it; or that Vlysses (ancient enough if he be that Elishah the sonne of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth) should visit Britaine in his trauels; whereof Brodæus maketh doubt; though Solinus report that an Altar in Calidonia was erected, and Vlysses in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be: for who doubteth but that the Greeks, in their vaine deuotions, did both build and sacrifice vnto their Gods, which they made of their worthiest men? and sith Vlysses, (in regard of his farre sea-trauels) was had in speciall account among all Nauigators, why might not such monuments be reared, and his name inscribed, as farre as the Grecians trauelled, though his person neuer came there?

And if the Romans, at whose greatnesse the whole world trembled, were so lately known in those ancient times, as that neither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yea and with much adoe at last were heard of by the Grecians themselues: as Iosephus affirmeth; And if the Gaules and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many yeeres together were vtterly vnknowne to the worlds historiographers; shall we then thinke, that this remote Iland, and people then far from ciuilitie, were noted foorth with markes of more certainty? surely to my seeming, nothing lesse: seeing that their next neighbours the Gaules knew not so much as what manner of men they were: none resorting thither, except some few merchants, and they no further, then vpon the sea coasts, neither able to describe the bignesse of the Iland, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for war, the lawes that they vsed, the customes of the people, nor their hauens for the receit of ships; all which Cæsar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purposely to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to bee wondred at seeing the entercourse of their trafficke was vpheld by so meane commodities: for Strabo saith, that their merchandizing chiefly consisted in Iuory Boxes, Sheers, Onches, Bits, and Bridles, Wreathes and Chains, with other conceits made of Amber and Glasse; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and impost vnto Octauian Augustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very meane, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that ships were first inuented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I haue cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke: and no doubt practised by that patterne of many others. But that the acient Britaines had ships of reasonable vse, though of simple Art; Cæsar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and couered ouer with leather, which kinde the now-Britaines call Corraghs: and with them (saith Polyhistor) they did saile betwixt Britanny and Ireland, (which sea for roughnesse and danger may bee compared with any other whatsoeuer) though the bulk of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, couered with the hides of Buffles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they abstaine from meat: whereby it seemeth they neuer sailed any great journeys. And of this their shipping Pliny also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

Thus on the ſpacious Poe the Venice Merchants glide,
And Britaine Pilots ſaile on ſurge of Ocean wide.

But after-times brought the Britaines to more exquiſite skill in nauall affaires, inſomuch as the royall Nauy of this Kingdome hath bin reputed (and ſo is at this day) not onely the inuincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of all other kingdoms which haue or ſhall enuy our happy peace: and the aduentures likewiſe of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world vnſearcht.

Cæſar. Com. 5. The Britaines coines.

(12) And their traffick amongſt themſelues was not of much worth, in that, as Cæſar ſaith, the Coynes which they had were either of braſſe, or elſe iron rings ſized at a certaine waight, which they vſed for their monies. Of which kind I my ſelfe haue ſeene found, and lately taken vp in little cruſes or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more ciuill, and trafficke more frequent, they ſhortly after ſtamped both ſiluer and gold; and thereon the faces of their Kings, euen in the daies of Iulius Cæſar, who was the firſt that had his owne ſtampt on the Romane Coynes. Many of theſe are amongſt vs remaining, whereof I haue inſerted ſome few, as in their due places ſhall follow, which I receiued from the liberall hand of that moſt learned Knight Baronet, & worthy ſtorer of Antiquities, Sir Robert Cotton of Cunnington. Theſe Coynes are commonly imboſſed outward & ſhield-like, whereon the inſcription or face, is ſeene, the reuerſe hollow, and therein their deuiſe ſet: and by theſe formes are they knowne to bee the Britaines, no other nation ſtamping the like, except ſome few among the Grecians.

(13) We come laſtly, to ſpeake of the manner of their warfare, which Cæſar thus deſcribeth. Firſt (ſaith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, caſting their darts: and often times with the terrible noiſe of their horſes, and the ratling of their chariot wheeles, they amaze the enemy and breake their array. And when they haue wound themſelues in among the troopes of horſemen, they leape foorth of their waggons, and fight on foote. In the meane while the waggoners withdraw themſelues ſomewhat out of the battell, and ſet their waggons in ſuch order, that if they bee ouercharged by the enemy, they may haue ſpeedy and eaſie recourſe vnto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remoue as the horſemen, and as ſtedfaſt to ſtand in the battell as the footmen, and ſupply both duties in one. And they are come to ſuch perfectneſſe by daily practice and exerciſe, that euen in ſteepe and falling places they will ſtop their horſes running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a ſhort roome, and run vpon the vergies, and ſtand ſtedfaſtly vpon the beames, and quickly recouer themſelues backe againe into the waggons.

They amaze the enemy with the ratling of their Chariot wheeles.

Cæſar. Com. 5.

Theſe would often giue ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, & then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept alſo ſuch an order in fighting on horſebacke, that whether the enemies chaſed, or were chaſed, they were alwayes in danger. For they neuer fought in great companies together, but ſcatteringly a great way diſtant the one from the other, and had ſtals lying in diuers places one to ſupply another, hauing euer freſh & luſty men in the roomes of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo alſo declareth; and Diodorus Siculus ſayth, that the Britaines liued after the manner of the firſt age of the world, vſing chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Troian warres. Pomponius Mela alſo deſcribing theſe Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not onely with horſemen and footmen, but alſo with waggons and chariots, harneſſed, and armed at the ends of the axle-trees with hookes and ſithes, after the manner of the Gaules; but with apparance of greater courage, as Tacitus ſaith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their ſtrength in field conſiſteth moſt of footmen, yet ſome countries there are (ſaith he) that war in waggons, the greateſt perſons guiding the ſame; and ſo much doth Iuuenall intimate, who in ſhew of prophecy, but indeed in flattery of the Emperour Domitian, ſalutes him after this manner:

They haue euer freſh men in the roomes of them that are weary. Strabo. Diodor. Siculus.

Dio. Dio Nicæus from Xiphilinus more particularly declareth their ſtrength; Their horſes (ſaith he) are but little, yet therewithall ſwift of pace: their footmen alſo run very ſpeedily but in their ſtanding are the ſtrongeſt: their armor are ſhields, and ſhort ſpeares, in the neither end whereof is faſtened a round bell of braſſe like vnto a ball, which at the firſt onſet of incounter they ſhake with great courage, ſuppoſing that ſuch a ratling noiſe doth much amate the enemy. And Herodian ſaith, that their ſhields were narrow, and ſpeares ſhort, wearing ſwords hanging downe their naked loynes, hauing neither knowledge nor vſe either of corſlet or helmet.

(14) Some haue thought that their women alſo were not exempted from the wars; but certaine it it is that many of that ſex were renowned for their valour amongſt them. Which made Tacitus to ſay, it was vſuall for the Britains to fight vnder the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their ſmart) nor to make any difference of ſexes for gouernment. A more noble paterne whereof, neuer had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queene, (the wonder of her ſex, and of all future ages,) who, as ſhe was inferiour to no Prince euer liuing, for her admirable gouernement in vpholding of her kingdomes peace, ſo was ſhe a match (to ſay no more) to the proudeſt monarchs, in her managing of her wars; as (when occaſion was offered) ſhee was ready to make good, in her owne royall perſon in the field. But beſides the vſe of armes, the ancient Britiſh women had another imploiment in the field, which I will only ſet downe in Tacitus his words, ſpeaking of Paulinus Suetonius his aſſailing of Angleſey: The Britiſh Army (ſaith he) ſtood on the ſhore, thicke of men and munition, and women running vp and down amongſt them, like furies, carrying burning firebrands in rufull attire, and with their haire hanging about their ſhoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift vp to heauen, pouring out prayers and imprecations. The ſtrangeneſſe of which ſight ſo amazed the Roman ſouldiers, that they ſtood ſtill like ſtockes, whiles the other wounded them at their pleaſure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another; not to bee ſo daunted by an army of women and wizards. &c.

The Britiſh womens ruful attire and the Druides behauiour in prayer amaze the Roman ſouldiers.

(15) In the relations of theſe things, let no man thinke, that the glory of theſe ancient and warlike nation of Britaines, is any wayes diſparaged or made inferiour to them that would be more famous, whoſe beginning hath been as meane, and ſtate as rude, if not more. For let vs conſider the Romans ſo lauiſh in their owne worths and greatneſſe; who notwithſtanding, bring their name and originall from Romulus, a baſtard by birth, nouriſhed by a beaſt, educated among a ſort of ruſticke ſhepheards: & growne to the ripeneſſe of his owne affections, hee became ring-leader of a damned crue, that liued by robberies & without laws: beſides the ſhedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Liuius their owne hiſtorian witneſſeth: and both himſelfe and followers had in ſuch contempt and deriſion by their neighbour nations that they both diſdained and refuſed to giue them their daughters in mariage, leſt in time they alſo ſhould become lawleſſe, vntill that by ſubtilty and force, they had rauiſhed their virgins, and thereby made them vnworthy of other matches. Yet when after their fortunes and ſucceſſe, had mounted them vpon the wings of glory, and ſeated them on the neckes of their ſubdued neighbours. their Cæſars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees muſt lineally be brought from the gods.

The Romans deriue their name from an infamous perſon.

And, to let paſſe many others, the like may be ſayd of the beginners of the Scythian and Turkiſh Empires, two golden pillers raiſed vpon leaden baſes: howſoeuer now, the power of their cõmand, circles three parts of the earth. Nay, what more is, that pretious, royall and Gods onely people, from whom the eternall King of Kings deſcended, in their offrings made in time of their higheſt glory, were by the Lord thus commanded to acknowledge and ſay: A Syrian was my father, who being ready to periſh for hunger, went downe into Ægypt, and ſojourned with a ſmall company. And the richeſt ſtone of that moſt beauteous building in his higheſt pride is counſelled by the Prophet; to look back to the rocke whence it was hewen, and to the hole of the pit whence it had been digged.

THE

THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAINE.

CHAPTER V.

The British gouernment.

WEE come, at length, to speak of the gouernment and politicall estate of the Britaines, which doubtlesse (the times then cõsidered) was as honourable in their rulers, and as manageable in the subiects, as any other nations in the se West parts of the world: their temperance, religiõ, learning, & noble resolution shewing no lesse. But in this point I must craue pardon of our British Heraulds, & some learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall succession from Brute, and a Monarchicall gouernment in those times of obscurity, through whose mists no Eagles eies could pierce, before the dayes of Geffrey ap Arthur, as before was touched; and therfore following his counsell, who is best able in these things to giue direction; I will begin the succession of Great Britains Monarchs, at the entrance & person of Iulius Cæsar; at which time, it seemeth by him and other Latine writers (the best Recorders of kingdoms affaires,) this Iland was gouerned rather after the manner of an Aristocraty, that is, by certaine great Nobles & Potent men, then vnder the command of any One as an absolute Monarch: though herein is a difference, in that in the Aristocraticall regiment, the Rulers are all Peeres of one Common wealth; whereas heere as many Princes, so many seuerall publike weales. For so Cæsar himselfe found the state of Britaine to be diuided into Prouinces vnder the names of her inhabitants; and to bee ruled by diuers Peeres or petty Kings.

How in Cæsars time and after

(2) And such a Gouernour was Cassibelan, ouer the Trinobants: Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Comius supposed to be King of the Atrebatij, and to be the same Comius of Arras, whom Cæsar imployed to rease and worke the Britaines to his subiection: Caractacus the warlike King of the Silures, Galgacus the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women also, without exception of sex, held gouernment among them, such was faithlesse Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, and famous Boudicea Queene of the Icenians. Whereby it seemeth that euery seuerall Prouince owed seruice & allegiance only to their owne Prince. And as their gouernments were confined vnto certaine bounds and limits, so were the Inhabitants diuided and distinguished by diuers Names: of whom becaus we shall haue occasion hereafter often to speak, it shal not therefore be amisse in this place once for all, tablewise to lay down the same; whereby our narrations may passe vntroubled without more explanations, and the readers minde carried with lesse incombrances. Those ancient names of people, and places for abode, throughout the whole Iland, from Ptolemie were as follow.

(3) Theſe

Their emulation and ambition.

(3) Theſe States ambitiouſly banding each againſt others, to raiſe their owne Prince to a more ſoueraigne ſupremacy, and to enlarge their Prouinces vpon the borders of the next, were euer ready, the leaſt occaſion miniſtred, ſaith Pomponius Mela, to enter quarels, and ſeldome held amity, or were quiet. This was the cauſe, as Tacitus tels vs, which brought that puiſſant nation into bondage: & was the only helpe to the Romans victories: for ſeldome it chanced (ſaith he) that two or three ſtates met in counſell, and concurred in opinion to repulſe the common danger: ſo that whilſt they reſiſted and fought one by one, all at length were ſubdued. But this was not at once performed by Iulius Cæſar the firſt Roman enterer, who (as he ſaith) rather ſhewed the place to poſterities, then gaue them the poſſeſſion thereof, ſuppoſing it his glory ſufficient, to haue done what he did. For vnto the daies of Domitiã, they held play with the Romans, & that with ſuch valor, that the ſubduing of ſome ſmall part of this Iland was accounted by themſelues to match the conqueſts of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour ſhewed in their publike triumphs for one Britains misfortune, then vſually was ſolemnized for whole kingdoms ſubdued.

(4) That ſuch people poſſeſſed, and that many Kings together raigned here in Britaine, Pomponius Mela doth ſhew: Britaine (ſaith he) bringeth forth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without ciuility and barbarous. And Cæſars intendments being known vnto them, it is ſaid that many of their Cities ſent him by their Embaſſadors proffers of ſubmiſſion: whereby appeareth their diuerſities of States, whreof onely two held promiſe, and the reſt failing was the occaſion of his ſecond expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, ſpeaking of the ſhipwrack ſuffered by the Romans in the raigne of Tiberius, ſaith, that many of their ſouldiers then diſtreſſed and torne, being caſt vpon the coaſts of Britaine, were by the people curteouſly releeued, and by their petty Kings ſent backe vnto Germanicus their Generall into Germany; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawn (as elſe where he ſayth) by emulation into many partialities and factions; which was indeed their owne deſtruction. And by Gildas theſe were termed cruel Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Hierome.

(5) Let thus farre ſuffice, in generall, of theſe ancient Britains, whoſe particulars we will further proſecute in the places of their reſiſtances, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould ſeeme to fight onely againſt themſelues. And therefore ſo many of theſe Gouernors, as either yeelded their ſubiections to the Romans, or ſtood their oppoſites till their owne ſttengths were ſpent, I will briefly touch, vntil ſuch time as the land was made a Prouince, by the valour and induſtry of Iulius Agricola the firſt Roman that found it an Iland, and left it more ciuill, and in ſubiection to the Roman Empire; and by the way I will inſert ſome of ſuch ancient Coynes, as among them were then vſed, expreſſing their names & places of coynage.

THE KINGS AND GOVERNORS OF GREAT Britaine, with the Ancient Coynes vſed in their times.

CHAPTER VI.

THE firſt Britiſh Coyne (as is ſuppoſed) both by the faſhion thereof being ſhieldlike, & Name thervpõ inſcribed REX COM: denoteth Comius, (if hee be a Britain) King of the Atrebatij in this Iland: whom ſome judge to haue fled thence vnto Cæſar, as a traytor to his Natiue country, & in Gallia vanquiſhed thoſe parts, that lay coaſted againſt the Wight, wherein (by Ptolemy) the people called likewiſe likewiſe the Atrebatij inhabited: ouer whom hee receiued the gouernment by the gift of Cæſar, and was by him imploied to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that he was King of the Atrebatij in Britaine, may be ſtrengthned by that which Cæſar in his ſecond booke of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge hee ſaith, that one Diuitiacus raigned ouer a great part of Gallia, and ſome portion of Britaine alſo: and ſo likwiſe this Comius is reported to be of great reſpect among our Britaines, and able in that country to doe much. Neither is it altogether vnlikely, ſeeing the Britaines diſtaſted his loyalty to Cæſar, and his Ambaſſage for their ſubiection, with ſuch diſlikes, that they laid violent hands vpon him, and caſt him in priſon, vſing no ſuch rigor againſt the reſt of their owne Ambaſſadors. Notwithſtanding when ſucceſſe altered, they ſet him at liberty, and made him their meanes to pacifie Cæſar.

Cæſar. Com. l 4.

Other Coynes I haue inſerted to ſuch Britiſh Princes as by their inſcriptions are knowne to bee theirs. And whereas ſome are not yet noted by that honor to the world; I haue vnto ſuch added onely blankes, if happily more be reuealed hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliuer to others her treaſures hid, as formerly (and in theſe our ſearching dayes) ſhe hath already done.

(2) Caſſibelan, as the moſt worthy among the Britains Kings, to withſtand the common danger now ready to light vpon them all, by the inuaſions and wars of the Romans, was by a generall conſent choſen their chieftaine, though in times paſt he had moleſted his neighboring prouinces to the inlargment of his own. Whoſe ſignories, as Cæſar ſaith, were ſeuered from the Cities towards the ſea-coaſt by the riuer Thames, about foure-ſcore miles from the ſame. Hee had obtained the gouernment of the Trinobants, by the ſlaughter of Imanuence, and the expulſion of Mandubrace his ſonne. And, with great valour, held oppoſite to the Romans, vntill the reuolt of his chiefe Cities, the Cenimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bibroces, Caſſians, and other ſtates, which drew backe, and yeelded to the enemy; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent, ouerthrowne, his owne town won, and himſelfe forced to yeeld vnto Cæſar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yeerely to Rome. A Britiſh Coine of gold with the inſcription CAS in ſcattred letters we haue inſerted; as alſo another wheron is in ſtamped the word VER ſuppoſed to be his, becauſe it is thought to haue bin coined in ancient Verolam, the City of Caſſibelan, in his daies, before the Romans won it.

Cæſar. Com. l. 5.

Verolam a famous City neere to the place where now S. Albons is.

(3) Cingetorix: Caruill. Taximagull: Segonax: whom Cæſar calleth Kings that raigned in Kent, were inſtigated by Caſſibelan ſuddenly to ſet vpon, and to aſſault the Roman forces, that lay encamped vpon the ſea ſhore whilſt he kept Cæſar occupied further in the maine: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being ſlaine, three of them chaſed, and Cingetorix the chiefeſt taken captiue. This heauy newes and vnfortunate ſucceſſe, cauſed Caſſibelan to ſue vnto Cæſar, and by the meanes of Comius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a Prince of the Trinobantes, but a traytor to his country; whoſe father Imanuence being ſlaine by Caſſibelan, and his owne life likewiſe ſought after, and in danger, fled vnto Cæſar into Gallia, and followed his fortunes in the wars; wherein he was a great ſpur vnto Cæſars forwardneſſe for Britaine, both to be reuenged vpon the murtherer rer of his father, and to recouer the gouernment of the Trinobantes vſurped by Caßibelan: preferring his own ambitious deſire, & the reuenge of one mans death, before the freedome of his natiue Countrey, or the deaths of many his countrimen, that daily ſtopt the Romanes paſſage with ſtreames of their bloud. He recouering his chiefeſt City with the protection of the Romans, yeelded ſubiection, and forty hoſtages to Cæſar: whoſe example drew others to ſell their owne liberty, and to buy many miſeries at too deare a rate, and with too late repentance: him doth Beda call Androgorius.

Theſe people or States, ſeeing the proceedings and happy ſucceſſe of Cæſar, after the example of the Trinobants, whoſe chiefeſt City had yeelded him obedience, and were thereby ſecured, & protected from the harmes of his ſouldiers, ſent him likewiſe their ſubmiſſions, and were accepted into ſubiection: ſo ready were they to ſaue their owne ſtakes, that they left the whole to the hazard of loſſe, which ſoone after followed as an ouerflowing floud, wherein was laſtly drenched the whole Ilands liberty.

(6) Cunobeline (for ſo vpon his Coines his name is inſtamped) was the Sonne of Theomantius, and hee the ſonne of Lud (as ſay our Britiſh hiſtorians, by whom his name is corruptly written Kymbelyne) hee liued at Rome, and in great fauour with Auguſtus Cæſar the Emperour, by whom hee was made Knight, and by his meanes the peace of Britaine was continued without the paiment of their Tribute, as Fabian out of Guido de Columna hath gathered. In the fourteenth yeere of his raigne, the Day-ſtar of Iacob appeared, and the rod out of Iſhai did flouriſh from the wombe of a Virgin, when the wonderfull Counſeller, the mighty God and Prince of peace, the Emmannuel, God with vs, was borne at Bethlehem of his maiden-mother the bleſſed Virgine Mary, and was made man like vnto vs in all things, ſinne onely excepted. Theſe were the times that great Kings and Prophets deſired to ſee, but ſaw them not, when the Wolfe and the Lambe, the Leopard and the Kid, the Calfe and the Lyon fed together; for warre was not heard of then in the world but rather their ſwords were made into mattockes, and their ſpeares turned into ſithes, as the Prophets, Sibyls, and Poets from them haue affirmed. In Rome the temple of Ianus was ſhut, and in Britaine Cunobeline enioyed peace with the reſt of the world, world, and his fame was made more famous by the many Coynes inſtamped of him, and whoſe face thereon among all the Britiſh Kings was firſt inſcribed, as by theſe here inſerted doth euidently appeare, one with two faces, like vnto Ianus, and ſix more with his owne, beſides three others wherein is read his name, one of them with a womās head; another with a horſe and the third with a wreath; all theſe (if not more) are knowne to bee his, which ſheweth his wealth, his fame, and his ciuill reſpect.

The chiefeſt Citie for his princely reſidence was Camalodunum, now Malden in Eſſex, wonne by Claudius from the ſonnes of Cunobeline, as by the inſcription of the Coyne next enſuing appeareth, and wherein many of the Britiſh monies alſo receiued their impreſſe.

This City with the free towne Verolam afterwards felt the heauy hand of mercileſſe Boduo in her reuenge againſt the Romanes; who laid the beauty and gorgeous buildings thereof ſo leuell with the earth, that thoſe walles and mounted turrets neuer ſince as yet could aſpire to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Adminius the firſt ſonne of Cunobeline, King of the Britains, by Suetonius his report, vpon ſome offence was baniſhed the Iland by his father, and with a ſmall traine fled ouer the ſeas into Belgia; wher Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition againſt the Ocean. And yeelding himſelfe to his protection, added matter to his vaineglorious humors, as of a great victory and conqueſt; ſending the newes thereof to Rome: with an eſpecial command that his letters ſhould bee deliuered in the Temple of Mars; and that in the aſſembly of a full Senate. It is iudged by learned Cambden, that the Romans Coyne aboue prefixed, vpon whoſe reuerſe is inſcribed, Metropolis Etiminij Regis, to be meant of this Adminius the ſon of Cunobeline, whoſe Citie Camalodunum, Claudius Cæſar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherin a temple was built & conſecrated vnto him, attended by the Prieſts Auguſtals: which heauily burdened the poore eſtates of the Britaines.

Dio calls him Catacratus.

(8) Catacratus another ſonne of Cunobeline, immediately after the death of his father, found himſelfe agreeued at the Romanes, for the retaining of certaine fugitiues the betraiers of their natiue country; whereof one Bericus was a chiefe and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts againſt the Britaines. This Catacratus maintained reſiſtance againſt Aulus Plautius the Emperors Deputy, with ſuch noble reſolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his perſon and army. But Fortune and victory attending the Romanes, brought at length Catacratus their captiue into bands, with great ſlaughters of his Britaines, himſelfe led ſhortly after in great triumph through Rome in honour of Plautius his ſo fortunate ſucceſſe. The miſeries of others thus made the Romanes to mount the chaire of their triumphs; and the chaines of their captiues, the records of their preſent aſpired pride.

But the bordering Dobuni ſeeing his fall, made their owne ſtandings ſurer by yeelding themſelues ſubiects to Rome.

Tacitus in vita Agricolæ.

(9) Togodumnus the third ſonne of Cunobeline, and ſucceſſour to Catacratus, proſecuted his countries quarrell with the like boldneſſe and reſolution as his brother before him had done: & was the onely touch-ſtone that gaue Veſpaſian his luſtre, whoſe interpoſition (as Tacitus ſayth) was the beginning of that greatneſſe whereunto afterwards he aſpired. And with ſuch manhood followed the chaſe of the Romans, that in a bloudy battell he ended his life, and brought Plautius their Lieutenant vnto a ſtand, where ſtraitned in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to ſend to Claudius the Emperour whoſe conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greateſt glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his aſſiſtance in perſon himſelfe, the firſt ſince Iulius Cæſar that attempted their conqueſt. His recorded compoſitions made with Aruiragus, the marriage of his daughter, & building of Gloceſter, I leaue to be read out of Geffrey of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choyce of his hearer, onely making that the poſſeſſiō of ſo fair a land drew the affection and aged perſon of this Emperor to vndergo ſo farre diſtant and dangerous a iourney, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

(10) Cogidunus a Britaine borne, receiued in pure gift at the hands of the Romanes, certaine Cities, ouer which he peaceably raigned their King. For when they had conquered the neereſt part of this Iland, and reduced it into the forme of a Prouince, according to their ancient policy, it was their cuſtome, (ſayth Tacitus) to vſe Kings themſelues for inſtruments of bondage, both in admittance of their authority, and in protecting them againſt their oppoſites. Other memoriall of him none remaineth, but that hee is reported to haue reſted euer moſt faith full to the Romanes, and was of them accordingly eſteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no ſuch good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to be Romes onely inſtruments, and Britaines vipers, that brought in ſtrangers to eat out the home-bred inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land with the heauy chaines of a forrain ſubiection.

Tacitus in vita Agric.

(11) Caractacus the moſt renowned Prince of the Silures, in nine yeeres reſiſtance waded through many aduentures againſt the common enemy. For when as the Icenians, Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and giue ouer, he onely with the Ordouices held out with ſuch ſeruice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Deſtinies determining the downefall of Britaine, the props that were ſet to ſtay it ſtill vp, proued too ſlender, and brake vnder the waight. For this bold Caractacus ouerthrowne in battell, his wife, daughter and brethren taken priſoners, and his forces defeated, committed himſelfe to the protection of Cartiſmandua the Brigantes faithleſſe Queene: who by her was deliuered to the Romans; and by P. Oſtorius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches & glory of that City, he openly and boldly checked the auarice & ambitious humours of the Romans, who being owners of ſo great and glorious things, were (notwithſtanding) couetous and greedy for the poore poſſeſſions of the Britaines. And there being led in triumph, with admiration he was beheld of all the ſpectators, and for his vndaunted ſpirit and magnanimous reſolution releaſed of bands, and taken into fauour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate aſſembled together, made glorious diſcourſes touching Caractacus captiuity, affirming it to be no leſſe honorable then when P. Scipio ſhewed Syphax vnto the people, and L. Paulus, Perſes, or of any other exhibited, vanquiſhed and ouercome. The Britiſh Coyne here aboue ſhewed by the ſcattered letters therein inſcribed, is by the iudicious obſeruers of ſuch ancient monies ſuppoſed to be his.

Tacit Annal. 12. cap. 8.

(12) Venutius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Cartiſmandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a baſe and vnſatisfied luſt) finding his bed abuſed by Vellocatus his ſeruant and harneſſe-bearer, raiſed his power againſt her, and her paramour. With him ſided his Brigantes, and the neighbour countries adioyning, whoſe good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a luſtfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputy: and theſe ſtriking battell won the day: yet ſo as the warre continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Venutius, and the infamy with Cartiſmandua, both for betraying the pledge of her truſt repoſed by Caractacus in his diſtreſſe, & her truth to Venutius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleaſures of a vaſſall before the bed of chaſte mariage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King, and hath to ages following left her name noted with the ſcarres of infamy, that time nor continuance ſhall euer weare away. His ancient coyn is thought to be as thou ſeeſt here aboue deſcribed.

(13) Praſutagus } King and Queene of Boduo } the Icenians, a people vnſhaken by war and themſelues rich; (as Tacitus reporteth;) the onely cauſe of their ruines, for which the Romanes then warred; were brought to deſtruction vpon this inſuing occaſion. King Praſutagus dying, by will left Nero his heire, (ſuppoſing by this meanes to leaue his ſtate the ſafer,) together with the protection tection of his two daughters. These contrary to trust, were abused and defloured, the mother Boduo turned out of all, and against all manly ciuility, or womanhood respect contumeliously and despitefully whipped. In the reuenge of which vnsufferable wrongs shee opposed & oppressed the Romans, that at one battell seuenty thousād (or as Dion Cassius saith) 80000. of their slaughtered bodies she sacrificed to her dead husbands ghost; and hath left the fame of her proceedings registred, euen by her enemies themselues, to her immortall & neuer dying memory. The strong Cities, Camalodunum, and Verolanium, she sacked with the rage of mercilesse war; Petilius Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, shee discomfited, Catus the Procurator shee droue ouer the seas, Posthumus the Camp-master durst not resist her, and all indeede feared the valour of this heroick Lady: whose lawes were not martiall to saue vpon ransome: whose reuenge was not pacified with yeeldings or submission, nor did she think there was bloud enough in the Romans to imbrue the altars of her assisting gods, or to wash off the staine of their ignoble and vnmanly injuries. But when succesſe altered, after losse and valours resistance, shee made an end of her life by poison, lest liuing she should see either her owne miseries in their triumphs, or leaue her remembrance in the records of their lauish and selfe-pleasing Historians. Her Coyne of gold we haue here expressed, the forme shield-like, and vpon the embossement thus inscribed: BODVO.

(14) Aruiragus the valiant British King, whom Humfrey Lhuyd confidently affirmeth to bee the same man that is called Meurigus, and is said to withstand Claudius in his enterprises for BRITAIN, vntil a composition of marriage was concluded betwixt the Emperours daughter and himselfe. Notwithstanding by Iuuenal it is plain, that this Aruiragus was in his fame in the dayes of Domitian, vnto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredoome his happy succesſe in the disposition of his gouernment ouer the Britaines, as in these verses are seene.

It bodes great honour to thy self, some King thou shalt depriue,
Or else Aruiragus from the rule of Britaines waine shalt driue.

Iuuenal Satyre.

An ancient British Coyne of Siluer is here inserted, and a mans head thereon instamped, which is supposed to be his, the letters alluding so neere to his name.

(15) Galgacus, a worthy aud a most valiant Prince of the Caledonians, for vertue and birth, preferred before any other in the Northerne parts of this Iland, and made their Generall against the inuasions of Iulius Agricola, was the last Britaine, that against the Romanes stood out: accounting those onely happy which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themselues the flower of all the British nobility, that yet had not subiected their necks to their yoke. The resistance which he made was great and warlike, but against the decree of God no man can stand; for the Romanes, risen to their greatnesse, bare downe all that withstood them; and in a bloody battaile subdued him and his forces; making all silent before them where they came, and leauing desolation in the places where they had beene. Thus then was the whole Iland subjected to the Romane Emperours, about one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Cæsars first entrance, and the land that had been ruled by many petty Kings, was brought now (as most parts of the world besides were) vnder the gouernment of one absolute Monarch. Grieuous, no doubt, was the losse of their liberties; but a greater gaine was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and sauage manners of the Barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became most ciuill. And he that had giuen their Iland to his Christ, prepared their hearts to receiue him their King, vnto whos subiectiō also they were motiues to the Romans themſelues. Two ancient Britiſh Coynes ſtamped in ſiluer wee haue here ſet downe, attributing them both to this Galgacus of Caledonia. Notwithſtanding in theſe (as in the reſt) I muſt ſubmit my ſelfe to the more experienced, and the cenſures of theſe ancient things to the learned and more iudicious.

(16) Theſe then were the reſiſters of the Romans proceeding, that rather yeelded their breaſts to the ſword, then their necks to the yoke of a forraigne ſubiection, & made their aſſaulters more famous in their conqueſts, and themſelues more renowned to following poſterities: neither in theſe relations haue we followed the records of our owne, but the approued teſtimony of their beſt Writers, who haue deliuered what we haue ſaid, and no doubt felt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iland, though their names died with their valiant reſiſtance. And as theſe Britaines held the Romanes at euen hand the ſpace of one hundred thirty ſix yeeres; neither yet then were ſubdued without themſelues, that euer ſided with the enemy againſt themſelues, and whoſe factions made way for the feete of their conquerours, as from Tacitus we haue declared: So their ſucceſſors the Saxons found as warlike withſtanders, till God for the Britains ſins had caſt down their ſtrength whereof more ſhall follow (Chriſt aſſiſting) in the due place of their ſtories, that from the raigne of Vortigerne, the ſcourge of his country, to Cadawllader the laſt Prince of the Britaines, ſpent their liues in their quarrel of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the ſtate of Kingdomes (how largely ſo euer extended, or by what humane wiſedome ſtrengthened with defence) doe finde their periods not to exceede much the number of ſix hundred yeeres, as by common experience among moſt nations is ſeen. In theſe times therefore when the world was ſhaken with wars, firſt by the Romanes that ſtroue to mount hie on the ſpires of their intended glory; and were by Gods decree appointed to ouer-run and afflict the earth, when Kings of people (I ſay) were inforced to lay the Crownes from their heads at their conquering feet; & free nations loaded with the yokes of their bondage: then was fulfilled the reſolution of this queſtiō demanded, Alas who ſhal liue when God doth this? And then among the reſt, Britaine gaue place to neceſſity with as manlike reſiſtance as did ſtates more ſtronger, or kingdomes confined with far more larger compaſſe. And Cæſar himſelfe bought his entrance with ſuch loſſe to the Romans, that no Emperor after aſſaied the like, before aged Claudius, whoſe opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his ſucceeding glory ſhould wholly ariſe. Num. 24. 23.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can be firme in this ſtill wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a ſecond triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for beſides the continuall poſſeſſion of their own country, as in that caſe vnpartiall Tacitus doth tell vs; their legions were tranſported into all parts of the world, and without whom almoſt no victory was wonne: of whoſe power and proweſſe in the expeditions of warre, both Dionyſius, Arrianus, and Seneca do ſpeake. To theſe then likewiſe if the Britaines gaue place, their lors came forth with the like price of the reſt, and in this Iland they bought their conqueſts as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine ſubdued by either of theſe nations, or their inuerſion and exchange of policy altred, but with as vnwilling ſubjection and ſtreames of bloud, as had been ſluced out of the ſides of their mightier nations, or by them had been tamed to follow their tryumphall Chariots. And more honour attributed to paſſe theſe Britiſh ſeas, with more admiration onely to ſee the Iland it ſelfe, then was vſually conceiued of Kingdomes more larger, or that lay jacent as farre from Rome. And the conqueſt of ſome ſmall parts of Britaine in no ſmall ſelfe-glory to bee inſcribed as tropheies of their victories vpon their Coynes, and to giue ſirnames to the Emperors & their ſonnes, as ſhall be ſhewed, when the age of this hiſtory ſhall be increaſed with the times of the Romanes affaires in this Iland. Free from ſubjection before the attempts of Caius Iulius Cæſar by the teſtimony Tacit. in his deſcription of Germany.

ſtimony of Diodorus Siculus, & neuer had yeelded to any forrein power, as not prouoked by Dionyſius or Hercules, not inforced by any to maintaine their liberties by the feats of warre. But Cæſar in Gallia thirſting after nouelties, or his conceited humour to purchaſe renowne, made the Sea ſeeme ſafe from dangers in paſſage: and himſelfe reſolute to venture his perſon amongſt thoſe bold and barbarous Britaines: wherein he left no meanes vnaſſaied for their conqueſt and ſubiection, nor his ſucceſſors omitted any prouident care to retaine and keepe the land in their poſſeſſions, which whileſt it ſtood a prouince in their obedience, was held and accounted the faireſt plume in their triumphant Diadem, and the loſſe thereof (if no more but onely in name) as was publikly affirmed, would proue a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to deſire it as they did, who beſides the great glory they conceiued in the conqueſt, made it the granary for the weſterne garriſons; beſides the delicate prouiſions for their Emperors owne tables.

And the German Saxons ſtraitned in their owne countries through increaſe of their people, or haply to ſupply their owne wants, infected with piracies theſe Weſt parts of the world, and among all others ſet the eye of their affections vpon this moſt beautifull Iland, and neuer left their attempts vnaſſaulted till they ſet the glorious diademe thereof vpon their owne heads; changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a tearme moſt fit to expreſſe that ſubiect, and pleaſing in ſound as Angelicall-like, neither haue themſelues proued vnworthy of ſo rich a poſſeſſion, that in wars haue maintained, and by voyages made knowne her fame as far as the ſun hath his beames, or the endleſſe Ocean her ebbes and tides. But of theſe things we ſhall haue occaſion hereafter.

And now addreſſe our ſelues to deſcribe our ancient Britaines, and to ſhew their true pictures as they are reported. At firſt rude and vnciuill (I taxe them no further then all others then were in the world, ſome few excepted that were only taught by God) and with the firſt were reclaimed to a more ciuill reſpect, both in their apparell & apprehenſion of literature; whoſe pictures in the Chapter ſucceeding we will demonſtrate as they are deſcribed by Cæſar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at firſt altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou ſeeſt; afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their country either for traffick or conqueſt; in both which manner take them as they are reported to be by theſe authors, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workmans beſt liking, nor thy ſelfe any whit diſparaged to bee brought from ſuch parents, which here are ſet as the pillars ſpoken of by Ioſephus, that after the flood did preſerue the inuented ſcience of the celeſtiall bodies, leſt time or elements ſhould cõſume that knowledge, or deuoure thoſe rules before demonſtrated: So the true portraiture of our ancient progenitors may by theſe be preſerued from the ruines of time, & made our motiues to be thankful vnto him that hath brought vs forth in this moſt ciuill times, and not onely clad vs with the garments of humanity, but by his ſpirit hath guided vs vnto a celeſtiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

THe vnderſtanding and apprehenſions of men clouded in ignorance, are by a Great Philoſopher compared to the eye-ſight of ſuch men, as ſtand & behold things a farre off; becauſe both of theſe though they apprehend ſome generall ſhapes and notices, yet can they not diſcerne of the true proportions and proprieties of their Obiects. The like happeneth in the ſearch and ſuruey, as of all all other Nations, ſo of our owne, of our firſt beginnings, our antique Cuſtomes, behauiours, habits, &c. the true circumſtances whereof are the more difficill to finde, in that thoſe things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yea ſo many Ages from the times wherein wee liue) but are alſo ſhadowed and enwrapped in manifold vncertainties and contrarieties, wherewith euen thoſe Writers haue perplexed our way, who vndertooke to be both our Guides & our Lights. Notwithſtanding, our purpoſe being to propoſe vnto the eye of our now glorious and gorgious BRITAINES, ſome generall draughts of our poore and rude Progenitours (that as, King Agathocles in his cheife feaſts vſed only earthen diſhes to put himſelfe in minde that his Father was but a potter, ſo we may remember that true Britiſh Nobility is more in Vertue, then in Anceſtors;) let vs firſt ſee what the principall notes and markes are, whereby the perſons of thoſe firſt Britaines were made ſo remarkeable among all other Nations.

The reaſon why Nations Originals are ſo hardly found out.

The three chiefe notes of the Britains

(2) Theſe Notes were chiefly three; firſt their going naked: ſecondly, their ſtaining and colouring of their whole Bodies: thirdly, their cutting, pinking, and pouncing of their fleſh with garniſhments (for ſo they thought them) of ſundry ſhapes and faſhions, as the two firſt enſuing Icones or Portraitures doe repreſent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very diſcrepant: and therefore ſith light is gotten out by colliſion of flintes, we will aſſay, whether out of thoſe Writers contradictions (brought to the ſtroke, and confronted together) wee may ſtrike ſome glimmering light, to direct vs how to paint them forth, who ſo delighted in painting themſelues.

1. The firſt note of the Britains, their nakednes.

(3) Firſt touching their going naked, the authority of Cæſar muſt ouerſway (as being ancienteſt) the too-generall reports of ſuch others, as ſeeme to relate that the Britaines generally vſed no Couerture, as neglectiue either of weathers iniury, or of ciuill modeſty, for he ſaith, interiores pleriq; pellibus ſunt veſtiti: the Inland men for the moſt part were clad with skinnes. And yet theſe Ilanders were the rudeſt of all the reſt, the Kentiſh and Seaborders being full of humanity, and little differing from the French ciuility: So that when Herodian ſayth, Veſtis vſum non cognoſcunt, nec induuntur quidem, they neither knew the vſe of garments, nor put any on: either he ſpeaks on heareſay, or his large report muſt bee reſtrained to ſome certaine Perſons, Times, and Places. And for certaine Perſons and Times indeede Pliny ſomewhat limits it, ſaying; that their married women, both elder and younger, (coniuges nuruſq;) in certaine feſtiuals vſed to goe ſtarke naked: ſo doth Dio alſo for certaine places: in their Tents (ſayth he) they liue naked and vnſhod, where he ſeemeth to allow them ſome couerture abroad. The like may beſuppoſed in time of Winter or War, where Herodian himſelfe ſayth onely, pleraq; corporis nudi; A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may ſeeme hereby, that thoſe Originals of Particular Nations were not much vnlike that firſt beginning of the vniuerſall pro-ſemination of Mankind, when our firſt Parents innocency walked in naked ſimplicity: the foundations of all things being as fartheſt from our ſight, ſo more ſimple and farre from thoſe artificiall frauds, which ſome call wit and cunning. And though an * ancient Father be miſtaken, in conceauing that by the foure letters of the name of Adam, were ſignified the foure quarters of the world, (that being an Hebrue name of three letters, and not a Greek of foure) yet all thoſe Quarters of the World participate ſomewhat of Adams diſpoſitions; & as all Naturall things returne by courſe to that whereof firſt they were framed, ſo if Lawes, Diſcipline, and Cuſtomes, did not reſtraine men, they would in time of themſelues reuolue to that firſt neglectiue condition, and careleſneſſe of thoſe outward reſpects whence men are now named Ciuill.

* Saint Cyprian interprets. Anatola, East. D. Duſis, weſt. Arctos. North. M. meſembrios, South.

(5) But in our Britaines, three reaſons there ſeeme of this their going vncloathed. Firſt their hardineſſe, which was partly naturall, and partly acquired by practiſe of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records, that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, & labours, inſomuch as they could endure to abide many dayes together in the water vp to the chin without any food at all; that they would liue in the woods on roots and barkes of trees; though one kinde of foode hee there mentioneth vnknown in our times, whereof vſing to take as much as a beane only, they were not ſubiect either to hunger or thirſt. No marueile, if thoſe, who would endure this, could endure the want of garments: eſpecially in a ſoile whereof we finde this Euloge.

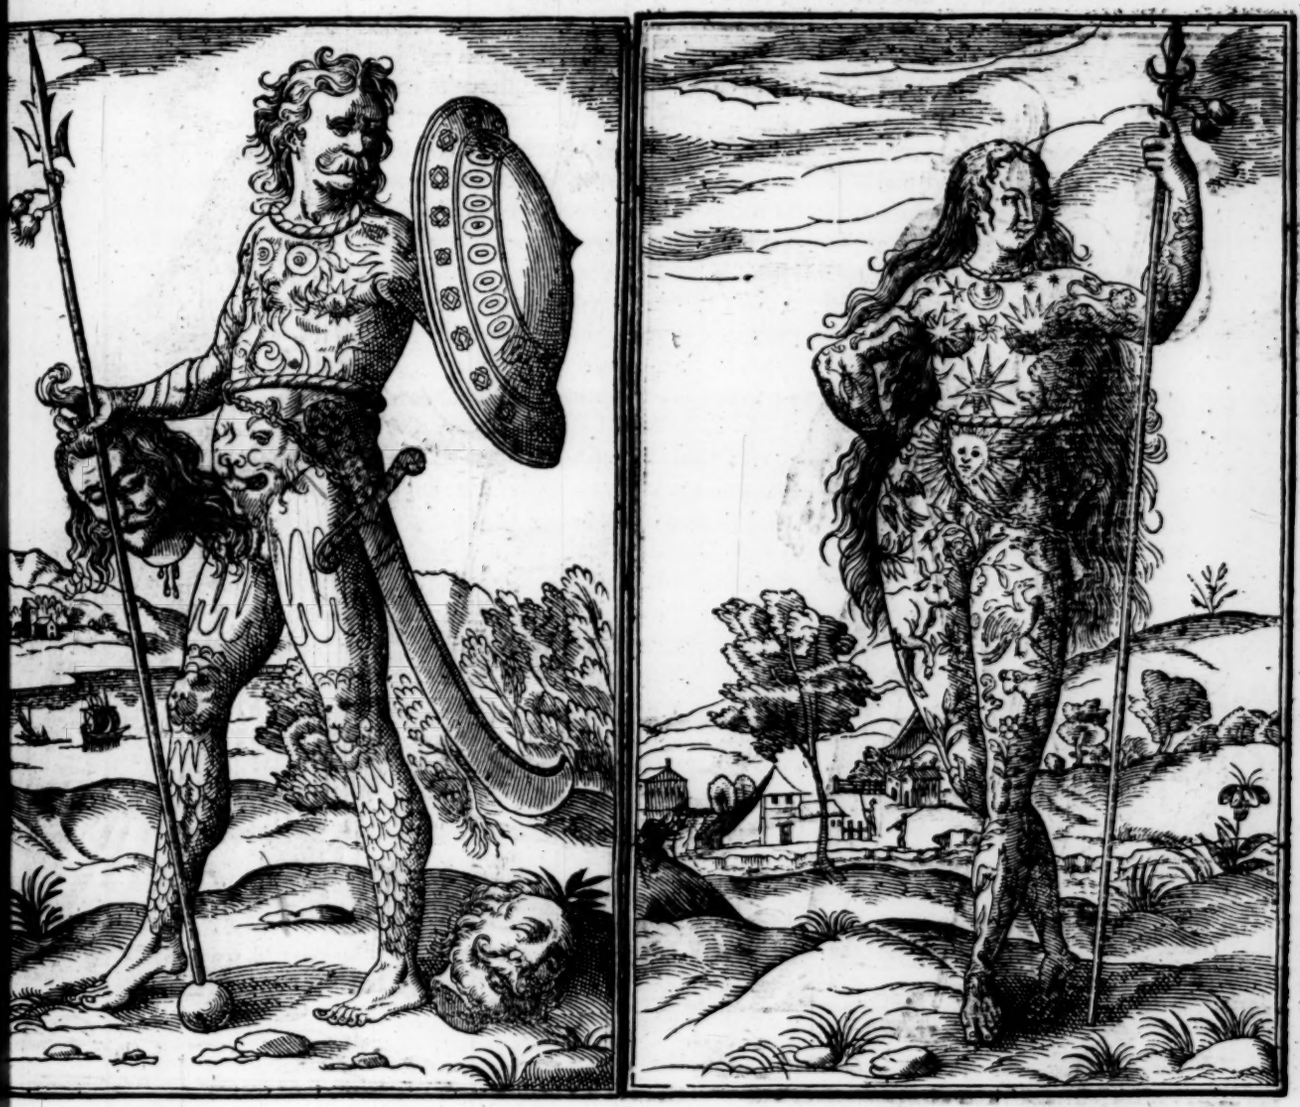
Nor



Nor freezing cold, nor ſcorching hot thou art,
Twixt both thou hold'ſt the meane and pleaſing'ſt part.

The like patience we find euen now not onely in the wilder Iriſh, and Virginians, but in rogues and wanderers of our own Country; who often pittileſſe of themſelues, voluntarily depriue their Bodies of this Protection againſt the Aires offence, to procure pitty of others. And what ſpeake wee of theſe? ſeeing euen children for Cuſtome, and Women for pride will ſuffer their Breaſts, and moſt tender parts of their Body, to bee expoſed not onely to offence of weather, but of modeſty alſo? yea generally, the hands, and faces, being of moſt ſubtileſt ſence, yet by cuſtome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like cuſtome the old Britaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinkes they vſually liued ſo long euen to the age of ſixeſcore, the externe cold keeping in and augmenting their internall heate.

Plutarch.

(6) As ability to endure colde, ſo ignorance (in many) of meanes to preuent it, may ſeeme another occaſion of theſe Britaines nakednes. The Romans (it ſeemes) in their old Conſuls times, and after, had not the skill nor vſe of Hats, Breeches, &c. That Britaine abounded with Wooll and other materials for cloathing is paſt all doubt, for which cauſe; by one in a Panegyrick it is named Rich in Paſturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with Vdders full of milke, and loaded with fleeces to the ground. So then Wooll was not wanting, but Will or Skill; the latter in moſt likelihood: for, as Strabo ſayth, that though thoſe ſtrutting Vdders yeelded great ſtore of milk, yet ſome of them had not skill to make cheeſe, & hauing hauing ſo rich grounds, yet had not the art of tillage, ſo their ſheepe might haue ſuch heauy fleeces, yet ſome of their Owners no cunning to keepe themſelues warme therewith. Some of them, I ſay; for otherwiſe, as Pliny touching Tillage, giues light to Strabo, witneſſing that others of them were ſo good Husbands as to manure their grounds with Marle, as likewiſe doth Dioſcorides, ſaying, they had skill to make drinke of Barley: ſo probable it is, that thoſe other who were by Cæſar and Tacitus ſaid to be ſo like the French in condition, had alſo ſome part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheepes backes to couer their owne.

Pliny. Dioſcorides. Cæſar. Tacitus.

(7) The laſt reaſon of ſuch their going naked ſometimes, was out of an opinion that no clothing ſo adorned them, as their painting and damasking of their Bodies, for which cauſe (ſayth Herodian) they would not couer themſelues, leſt then their gay painting ſhould not be ſeene: but Pomponius Mela makes doubt whether their thus painting themſelues were for ornament or for ſome other vſe; which doubt Cæſar ſeemes to reſolue, as if the men did it becauſe it made them looke more terrible in warre.

3. Pride. Herodian. Mela Cæſar.

(8) And thus wee are now orderly fallen on the ſecond of thoſe three notes appropriated by Authors to our Britains, which is their painting & ſtaining of their bodies; which appeares by Cæſar to haue beene more vniuerſally vſed then going naked, for all the Britaines (ſayth he) die their bodies with ſtaining. As Authours differ in the reaſon of this their painting, (as we ſhewed) ſo in the name, perchance alſo in the ſubſtance of that wherewith they ſtained themſelues, and ſomewhat alſo in the colour it ſelfe. The ſubſtance Cæſar

2. The ſecond note of the Britains, their painting. Cæſar.

Cæsar. ſar calles luteum, which yet in vulgar acception is thought to be ſome yellow ſubſtance, as Pliny cals luteum oui, the yolke of the Egge; Pliny. Pliny himſelfe ſayth the Frenchmen call it glaſtum, deſcribing it to be an herbe lik Plantaine, which Cambd. in Brit. p. 14. Oribaſius (as learned Cambden ſheweth) doth terme Vitrum, in which ſenſe Mela. Mela is vnderſtood to ſay that they were ſtained Vitro (and not Vltró) it being generally taken to bee Woad, from thoſe ancient times hitherto vſed for the ſureſt ſtaine. But for the colour which is made, Cæſar and the reſt agree, it was Cæruleus, blewiſh or azure, which colour the Cambro Britannes doe yet call glace, whence our glaſſe for windowes (called alſo vitrum) ſeemeth by reaſon of the colour, to haue taken name. Onely Pliny leaueth ſome Pliny. ſcruple, in saying, that the naked painted women imitated the Æthiopian colour; which muſt be vnderſtood either comparatiuely, in reſpect of People white and vnpainted, or becauſe blew a farre-off hath the appearance of blacke.

(9) That the Britains took their Name from this painting, hath beene already ſhewed out of Iſidore, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their owne language, wherein Breeth ſignifieth as much as painted or ſtained; but whether thoſe other inhabitants of the more Northerne parts of this Iland, called alſo Picti or painted, had their name vpon the ſame ground, & whether they were ſome branch of the Britiſh ſtocke, or of ſome tranſmarine Colonie; it is a queſtion not yet decided. Pomponius Lætus, and ſome other deriue them from Germany, ſome from the Pictones in France; but Beda from Scythia, whence ſaith hee, they are reported to haue come into Ireland in a few long bottoms, & finding no ſeating there, to haue entred into Britaine. Though Beda his authority be venerable, yet the learned find reaſons to induce them rather to beleeue, that they were the remaines of thoſe ancient Britaines which either inhabited the North-part of this Iland, before the Romanes entrance, or which (vpon their Conqueſt) fled thither to auoid the Romiſh yoke, where the difficulties of the aire & ſoile protected them from the Romanes ambition and inuaſion. Whereto Tacitus well accordeth ſaying that Agricola droue the Romanes Enemies (he meanes the more vntractable Britaines) into thoſe parts as it were into another Iland. And it is thought incredible, that thoſe Enemies of the Romanes, who ſent forth againſt Agricola, an Army of thirty thouſand ſtrong, & who ſo vexed Seuerus, that in one Expedition he loſt ſeuenty thouſand of his Romanes, & their Aiders were ſo vtterly extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being thoſe who afterward much perplexed and ouerran the Roman Prouince, and to whom (not vnlikely) ſome other, ſuch as Beda mentioneth, did afterward ioyne themſelues.

(10) If we would adde reaſons vnto Authorities, to proue that theſe Picts were no other then that multiplied offpring of thoſe Britains, we could produce their * Language, their manners, their kind of Gouernment (all bearing Britiſh Reſemblance) to confirme the ſame. But what neede? ſince the ſelfe-manner of painting is an vndoubted marke in the Children repreſenting of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian ſhewes, calling them, The Picts, ſo truly named; which Iſidore well expounds, The Pictiſh Nation had their name from their Body, depainted with the iuice of an herbe growing amongſt them. When therefore the Romanes excluded them from their other Prouinciall Britaines, this name (Picts) for diſtinctions ſake was in vſe amongſt them; before which times, yea and long after, they were knowne to Writers by no other name then Britaines, and the Roman Emperour, Commodus, Seuerus, Baſsianus, Geta, and vpon the Conqueſts of them, inſtiled themſelues Britannici, Britiſh (not Pictiſh) Conquerors. But after the Roman tongue had preuailed with the Romane ſword, the Britaines themſelues vſed to name any thing painted by the name of Picte; as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who ſayth, that the Britaines called certaine Sallops, Picts, becauſe their ſailes, tackle, and Mariners apparell, were coloured blew, the very colour, wherewith theſe Britiſh Picts, (as * ſomewhere they are truly called) vſed to ſtaine themſelues. When afterward the Iriſh-Scots had confederated themſelues, with theſe againſt the Romanes, they all began by degrees to be more ciuilized: the more Southerly of them being by Ninian the Britaine conuerted vnto Chriſt, about the yeere of Grace 430, thoſe other more Northward, by Columbanus Anno 565. by which time it is likely, that Ciuility increaſing, their painting and other like ruder Cuſtomes were well nigh forgotten, both amongſt them, and and also amongst those other Britaines, vnder the Romanes Gouernment. In which regard wee haue besides those præfixed Icones, and Patternes of their first and most sauaged times, here added also their Habits, when they beganne to put on with conditions, a little better cloathing also.

3. The third note of the Britaines, their picturing of their bodies.

(11) Neither may we thinke that formerly they refused such Apparell, onely to shew this staining and colouring of their Bodies: for besides it, some other bellishments they had, which they esteemed much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could bee. Which of the Britaines, Solinus thus deliuereth: The Country is in part (note that hee makes it not generall) inhabited by People barbarous, who by artificiall formes of incision haue from their Childhood sundry shapes of Beastes depourtraied in their bodies, and as their lims increase in growth, so doth the pictured worke together therewith, neither doth these wild people boast of any greater kinde of patience, then in bearing long-lasting scarres, where the paint had deeply suncke into their sliced flesh. The very paralell whereof is also by Isidore set downe touching our Picts, whose bodies sliced and pinked by an artificiall punchion, did sucke in the iuice of the staining herbe, carrying these rasures on their pictured limbes, as badges of their Noblenesse, thus endamasked. Neither onely the shapes of Beastes, but of all other things, were so printed in their flesh; which Herodian takes to bee the prime reason, why they delighted to goe naked, lest they should hide these their pleasing garnishments. Where also by the way may be obserued, since Solinus saith that the barbarous onely vsed so to doe, and Herodian, that those who did so, vsed therefore to goe naked; that therfore not the Britaines in generall, but the most barbarous of them vsed to goe naked. And very answerable to Solinus (who elegantly calleth such their figuring of themselues, inscriptis visceribus, a writing on their bodies) is that of Claudian, Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras, On dying Picts he readsthe breathles shapes, as if the beasts so liuely portraied on them, seemed to lie dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

(12) By these varieties of picturing (if* some haue not misinformed vs out of their alleadged ancient Authors) those people so distinguished themselues, that the married women were known by hauing pictured on their shoulders, elbowes, and knees, the heads of some fierce beastes, as Lions, Gryphons, &c On their Belly, the Sunne spreading his beames: on their Pappes, Moones and Starres, &c. On their armes, thighes, and legges, some other fancies of their owne Choice. But for their Virgins, their whole Body was garnished ouer with the shapes of all the faireſt kindes of flowers and herbes; which (to speake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a strange, yet no vnpleasing aspect. Whereas the men were (as Cæsar speakes) very horrible to be looked on, hauing all their breast and body disfigured with vgly Beasts, Serpents, rauenous Birdes, scales aud finnes of fishes, &c. In which relation yet; this scruple will not easily be remoued (if it bee true, that from their childhood their prints increased with their bodies) how those, who being Virgins had no prints but of herbes and flowers, becomming Wiues were so easily transformed either into Beasts or heauenly Creatures.

(13) The later Women (as you see by the later portraiture,) became farre more modest, that is indeede more womanly; hauing learned that then they openly shew most beauty, when openly they shew not their beauty: much lesse should they expose to the view, that which nature most endeuoured to hide, as knowing it least worth the viewing: yea * some obserue that women being drowned, naturally swimme with their face and foreparts downeward, whereas Men doe contrary; as if the impression of modesty were not to leaue a Woman euen after death. Agrippa who mentioneth it, reporteth also of some Matrons, so too-modest, that they chose rather to die, then to expose some hidden diseases to their Chirurgians view: A point vnfortunatly inserted into his witty book, in Prayse of women, which he dedicated to Margaret wife to Maximilian (afterward Emperour) shee, of womanly bashfulnes, chooſing rather to die, then to haue her thigh cured, which was broken with a fall from a horse. But about their neckes they wore a round circle of Iron (as an ornamen no leſſe eſteemed then gold with other Nations) as alſo about their waſte, whereat they hung their skeines: being (doubtleſſe) a moſt warlike Natiõ, (as their poſterity haue euerſince proued) and moſt deſirous to ſpill bloud, wherein yet their Offſpring by diuine bleſſing are now moſt different from their Anceſtors.

CHAPTER I.

The Romans the ſecond poſſeſſors of this Iland.

THE next Nation to the Britains that obtained poſſeſſion and ſoueraignty of this Iland, were the Romans, and of them Caius Iulius Cæſar the firſt, what time their State had vndergone all kinds of gouernments, and now aſpired almoſt to their higheſt pitch of glory. This Cæſar bearing the office of Queſtorſhip in Spaine, and naturally diſpoſed for great aſſaies, was thereto the more incited at the ſight of Alexanders portraiture, ſtanding in the temple of Hercules at * Gades, where beholding it with great admiration, fell into a ſudden diſlike of himſelfe, & (as Alexander in ſeeing Achilles tombe) with an ambitious, yet honorable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my yeeres atchieued the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto hauing done no memorable act? Euer after which hee disdained that his petty charge, and made sute to the Senate to bee dismissed: holding that the cloude which ouershadowed his following and (soone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome, obserued euery occasion that might make him gratious in the peoples eyes, hauing the aduantage of the time, which then was swayed with most dislikes: and entring into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspition of conspiracy, did notwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were euer made honorable, & himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State; vnto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, tooke vpon him the gouernment of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbare no occasion for warre, were it neuer so vniust or dangerous: Insomuch that framing a bridge of wood ouer the broad and swift riuer Rhene, he entred the country of the Sweuians, being the first Romane that assailed the Germans: And thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gaules in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his aspiring minde, and set his thoughts to worke vpon other attempts.

Cæsar the first Roman that assailed the Germans.

(2) For now intending a voyage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to inlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfy himselfe with the sight and seate of the Iland, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could finde content. But his pretence was reuenge against the Britaines, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gaules had receiued most of their supplies against him in all his warres, or as some haue written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft obserued.

But because the summer was almost spent, and that the voyage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned countriman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Cæsar set vp perspectiue glasses on the coast of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Caius Volusenus a military Tribune in a Galley before him, giuing sufficient instructions for so great an enterprise in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neerest coasted vnto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done, but that the Britaines receiued notice thereof, and thereupon some of their priuate States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submissiõ vnder the assurances of their hostages. Which Cæsar accepted and sent backe againe with liberall promises, ioyning in commission with them Comius a King of Atrebatij (for so he is stiled vpon his Coyne) a man well reputed and respected among the Britaines, that he might perswade the rest of the States to imbrace Cæsars amitie. In effecting of which businesse, some fiue dayes being spent, Volusenus returned, hauing waffed vpon the coasts of Britain so far as with safety he might, which was no further then to view it with the eye, his foot not daring to tread the shoare replenished with those barbarous people, (as it pleased the Romans to terme the Britains) His discouery and relation gaue smal encouragements to Cæsars hoped successe, and had not the Morines yeelded him their obedience, it may be thought his voyage at that seasõn had beene staied.

The Morines were of the hither parts of France, as Turwine, Calis &c

(4) But now composing his affaires in Gallia, and hauing ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Gallies also for transporting his army, he loosed from the shoare hauing a good winde, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him, himselfe early in the morning attained the sight of Britaine, whose cliffes he found couered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally beset, being strengthened with steepe hils and rocks, that he there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legates and Tribunes, decla-declaring vnto them the danger of the hauen that gaue such aduantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impeach their arriuage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(5) Their Counsell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar (both tide and wind fitting him) not foreslowing the occasion, gaue signe of remoue, and some eight miles distant came to * a plaine and open shoare, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britaines had remooued part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confesseth that his army was sore ouer-laid and terrified with that encounter: and had they not beene assisted from the Gallies with an vnusuall kind of Engines, which did beat backe the Britaines (vnexpert of that strange manner of assault) the Romans had not set foote on British soile, neither durst they then aduenture it, vntill the standardbearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt forth of the Ship with his Eagle, calling on the danted souldiers & asking whether they would dastardly forsake their ensigne & betray it through cowardize to the enemy? which opprobry prouoked them to follow his example, and so they got the shoare after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledgeth. But the first of all (euen before the Standar-bearer) who put courage into the Romanes and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Eutropius) one Scæua a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other souldiers in a boat to a rocke neere the shoare, where the tide leauing them, his fellowes slunke backe in the boat, but he most boldly defended himselfe from the rocke against the Britaines, like a beare at a stake among a multitude of mastiues, till hauing all his armour broken in peeces, and himselfe all wounded with darts, he swamme to the fleete; and begging pardon for his foole-heady forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgaue him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and he did Cæsar afterwards noble seruice at Dyrrachium in the ciuill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saued the fortification against Pompey, at which time his target was shewed to Cæsar, hauing 230. holes pierced in it by the enemy, whereof Iosephus Iscanus that ancient Poet of Excester writeth thus:

Hinc & Scæua satus pars non obscura tumultus
Ciuilis, Magnum solus qui mole solutâ

The Britaine Scæua in ciuill warres well knowne,

The first attempt assayed, that is warranted by any true Record for the conquest of this Iland: which happened in the yeere of the worlds creation 3873. and before the birth of our Sauiour Christ, 54.

(6) This enterprise for landing thus atchieued, Cæsar charged so fiercely vpon the enemy, that hee put them to flight; but wanting his horsemen to follow the chase, (which as yet were not arriued) he proceeded no further, but encamped his host vpon a great plaine, not farre from the Sea, and not without likelihood thought to be Barham Downe: for so neere lay it vpon the shoare, that thence he beheld the dispersion and losse of his 18. ships (comming vnder saile with his horsemen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

(7) In the meane time the Britaines, that after flight had againe recouered head, and in their assemblies aduisedly considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedy, and to that end sent their second Embassadours vnto Cæsar, with whom Comius before remembred was imployed, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsars cause, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reproofes, with hostages receiued for performance of Couenants, and resort of their Nobles to Cæsars campe, to yeeld themselues and Cities to his will.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romanes, and vnmatchable to them in educated ciuility, yet were so skilfull in the affaires of warre, & so ready to discern the least aduantage that they easily perceiued the weakenes of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equall their wagons, wherein chiefly stood the strength and order of their fight, as also of ships for seruice and safety, as occasions should be offered: whereby their mindes touching their promised submission began to wauer, & the matter with better aduice to be pleaded in their assemblies; for that not only these forsaid ships for Cæsars supply were dispersed and hindred, but euen his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour, by the rage of winde and sea, (being then springtide, and the moone in the full) was not onely filled with waues, but also their tacklings, sailes, and anchors spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bulkes one against another, that their bruised bottoms were thereby made vnfit for burden.

Cæsars ships distressed.

(9) This losse was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three aduerse fortunes which euer happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well obserued by the Britaines, that immediately they intended a reuolt, and in Counsell vrged this as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselues as impious, if they should refuse to ioyne consent with the heauens, whose elements had thus farre fought for their freedome and full deliuerance, assuring themselues (if on this aduantage they might cut off these new guests) that neuer any afterward would aduenture to enter Britaine in hostile manner.

Sueton. in vita Cæsar.

Britains reuolt.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of couenants, and daily to withdraw themselues from Cæsars Campe, which gaue him iust occasion to suspect whereat they aimed. And to preuent their proceedings he as wisely wrought: for first reparing his Nauie with the hulls, timber, and tackling of the most bruised ships, with the losse of twelue ships onely, the rest were made able to brooke the seas. And prouiding against the aduantage of the enemy, hee sent foorth the seuenth Legion for forrage to supply any occasion.

(10) This Legion taking the coast cleere, and little surmising so sudden a reuolt, fell to the sickle and sithe like haruest labourers, and laid their weapons aside, mistrusting no Enemy. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practise what they had determined, closely had laid themselues in ambush, for thither they knew the enemy would come, a peece of corne there standing, wheras in all other parts haruest was past: and so hauing these workmen in their danger, suddenly fell vpon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselues in a ring (the best defensiue forme of embatteling) and stood on their guard as they might: but had they not happily been rescued, Cæsar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

The Britains suddenly assaile the Romanes,

(11) For though this skirmish thus in acting was altogether vnknowne and vnexpected to the rest of the Romanes, yet by the rising of the dust, appearing to the Cohorts that warded before their Campe, the same was mistrusted, which caused Cæsar in all haste to make thitherward with part of his host.

(12) The Britaines thus preuented, seeing more supply to maintaine the battle stood still, without further stroke: and the Romanes as much amazed at this sudden attempt, and order of their fight, made a stand, not venturing any further. Which order in fight so often mentioned, and so much admired, in Cæsars words we will declare, the rather because some haue thence collected, that the Britaines were the of-spring of the Troians, who with other Easterne Nations only vsed this kinde of fight in Chariots.

Clem. Edmonds his obseruations on Cæs comment. lib 4. cap. 12. obser. 1

(13) They vsed (sayth hee) to ride in wagons against the approch of the enemy, and to circulate them about with a whirling compasse, and ratling noise, each wayes casting their darts as they did driue, and euer as they saw aduantage, would winde themselues in amongst the horse and foot, to breake the array; which done, they would forsake their wagons, and on foot most dangerously assaile the enemy. In the meane while the waggoners would with-draw themselues somewhat out of the battle, and place their wagons in such order, that if their masters were ouer-charged, they might haue speedy accesse, and opportunity of retrait, by which meanes they were euer as quicke to moue as were horsemen, and as stedfast to stand the battle as were the foot, whereby they did supply the duties of both at once, and by daily exercise grew so expert in managing their horses, that running them forcibly downe a steepe hill, they would stop, and turne them in the mid way, and they would run along the beame, and stand firme vpon the yoke; whence with like facility they would againe returne into their Chariots.

Cæsar. Com. li. 4.

The manner of the Britaines fight.

This order Cæsar so well obserued, as that notwithstanding his desire of reuenge, yet wanting his horsemen (as he pretended) wherein consisted the chiefest resistance, hee durst attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without profer of battle.

(14) The Britaines likewise hopelesse of further successe at that present, departed parted without any impeachment, intending to prosecute their cause with a greater and more generall supply: and thereupon sent messengers to their seuerall States, with notice of their hopes against so small a power, whose campe by them if any way might be vanquished, the purchase of spoile, besides their freed liberties, would requite the paines.

The Britaines gather a greater power.

(15) These States, though maintaining ciuill factions amongst themselues, yet seeing the intended danger of this generall enemy, presently assembled a great power; purposing yet once againe to try the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæsar, whose vigilancy did euer equall his valour, prepared his army, wherin now only 30 horsmē were present, & those brought to him by Comius the King. The battle ioyning continued not long, but that the Britaines gaue backe and fled, whom the Romans pursued as farre as strength indured, and returned with the slaughter of many, burning the Country where they came.

Cor. Tacitus in vita Agricolæ.

Comius suplieth Cæsar with 30 horse.

(16) Thus the Britaines once againe vanquished, forthwith sent their third Embassage vnto Cæsar, desiring peace with promise of quiet subiection; whom he with hard termes now reproued, and imposed a double number of Hostages to be brought him into Gallia, whither hee made all possible preparation, for that the Aequinoctium drew neere, doubting his crazed ships would hardly brook the winter stormes, that vsually rage vpon these Seas. And hauing gotten a faire wind, imbarked all his forces about midnight, and so brought most of his fleet safe to the continent. This enterprise so fortunately accomplished, Cæsar by his letters made knowne to the Senate, who decreed and proclaimed to his honour a generall supplication or thanksgiuing to their Gods, for the space of twenty dayes together, wherein all the Romans, clothed inwhite garmens, and crowned with garlands, went to all the Temples of their gods, and offered sacrifices for so glorious a victory.

The Britaines submit themselues the third time.

Cæsar was now the first that had 20 dayes euer granted: the greatest victories hauing before but 5 dayes, or 10 at the most.

CAESARS SECOND EXPEDITION INTO BRITAINE.

Chapter II.

CÆSAR expecting the performance of Couenants, agreed vpon in the treaty of peace with the BRITAINES receiued hostages from two of their CITIES onely, and no more: the rest drawing backe, refused his subiection: whereupon intending not to lose so rich a prey, nor to suffer that SVNNE to bee eclipsed, whose glory thus farre in his HORIZON had ascended, hee appeased some troubles in GALLIA, and in the Winter season began his preparation to that Enterprise. And hauing had experience of his former wants, hee furnished himselfe accordingly, and the next spring following drew his forces towards CALIS, the shortest cut into BRITAIN. There committing the charge of Gallia to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himselfe with fiue Legions of souldiers, 2000 horsmen, and 800 shippes, about the going downe of the Sunne loosed from the shoare, and with a soft Southerne gale were carried into the streame. But about midnight the wind failing and their sailes becalmed, the tide diuerted their course: so that in the dawning he well perceiued his intended place for landing to be passed.

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of the tide, and indeuours of their Oares, about noone the same day hee recouered the shoare, euen in the same place (and that without any shew of resistance) where he had found best landing the Summer before. There in conuenient manner he encamped his host, and by certain Fugitiues got notice of the power and place of the enemy.

Cæsar againe landeth at the place of his first arriuall.

(3) And lest delay should afford them aduantage, hee cõmitted the gouernment of his ships at anchor to Qu. Atrius, and his campe on land to the gard of ten Cohorts; besides the strength of three hundred horsemen; and himselfe with the rest about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enemy, proceeding with such celerity, that by the day dawning they were entred twelue miles higher into the Continent: where seeking to passe a riuer, which is supposed to be the water Stower, the Britaines with their Darts and Chariots began in most terrible manner to assault the Romanes. But being at length by them repulsed, tooke into a wood strongly fortified both by nature and mans industry. For in the time of their owne dissensions, they had formerly made this place one of their strongest fortresses, & had cut downe many trees, which ouerthwart the wayes of entrance they had bestowed.

Cæsar resisted at the riuer Stower.

(4) In this they secretly kept, and where they saw aduantage, would by companies sallie out vpon the enemy to their no little annoyance. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the seuenth Legion to raise a banke, and to build a Testudo of boards, couered with raw hides, by which meanes the place without much adoe was won, and the Britaines forced to forsake the woods. Whose chase Cæsar forbade, both in regard the day was neere spent, as also that the country was altogether vnknowne to the Romanes. But the next day the pursuit being begun, sudden newes was brought from Q. Atrius, that most of his ships the night before by a violent tempest were cast on Land, their bulks shaken, their cables broken, and anckours lost. Cæsars experience in like mishaps the Summer before, made him so much more ready to preuent the worst. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haste returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, wherein forty of his ships were quite lost. Wherefore he wrote to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gallia for supply of ships, thence to bee sent in all haste. Then gathering his shipwrights out of the Legions with the ruines of the bruised bulkes, he repaired the whole, and now hauing twice felt the dangers of these seas, caused his whol fleet, (a strange attempt) to be drawn on land, euen into the midst of the fortifications of his campe, so to secure them from the like mishap, and that one strength might defend both.

The Britaines driuen from their fortresse.

Cæsars Nauie greatly impaired by tempest

He draweth his fleet on shoare.

(5) In which admirable toile ten dayes and nights were altogether spent, before he could return to the place frō whence he came; where now the Britains through great confluence of people had increased their power, and entred againe their fortresse and wood. The chiefe command of these affaires was committed to Cassibelan, whose coine we haue here likewise set, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whose Seigniory was seuered from the Cities towards the Sea by the great and famous riuer Thamisis, and extended into the land full fourescore miles.

This Cassibelan present Gouernour of the Trinobants, had attained to the possession of their chiefest Citie by the slaughter of Imanuence their former Ruler (a man well respected, and much lamented after death) whose son Mandubrace, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new established authority of Cassibelan, had made ouer into Gallia, crauing Cæsars assistance to set him in his right.

Cæsar comm. li 5.

(6) Cassibelan (if among these authentike Authors the British writers may bee heard) was the brother of King Lud, and in the nonage of his nephewes, gouerned the Trinobants, whose bounds hee sought to enlarge vpon the bordering Countries of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had so borne himselfe, that hee was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoked alike in a common perill, they laid aside priuate grudges, and held him the onely man to support the strength of their troubled and declining estate, and by a common consent made him General of their Warres. The expectation of whose proceedings he long delayed not, but with a fierce and hot encounter did assaile the Romanes, and so manfully discharged the parts of his place, that in the sight of the whole Campe Quintus Laberius a military Tribune was slain, (in memory whereof the place as yet, though somewhat corruptly, is called Iul. laber) and Cæsar himselfe professeth he learned many points of of martiall policy by their braue and running kind of encountering.

(7) But his next dayes seruice proued not so fortunate; for the Romanes hauing learned their owne defects by the former dayes experience, laid aside their waighty armour, that with the more facility they might both assaile the enemies, and with like nimblenesse auoid their fury, they hauing now bestowed their powers dispersedly, and scattered their troupes into companies, whereby the Romans were still matched with fresh supplies. A policy no doubt of no smal consequence, had not destiny determined the fatall subiection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raised the Romans almost to the height of their Monarchy.

Britaines retire to their seueral Prouinces.

(8) For this failing, the Britaines neuer after shewed themselues with any vnited resistance, but hauing lost the day, departed, thinking it better to secure euery priuate by his owne meanes, then by a generall power to hazard all, as hopelesse any more to vphold that which the heauens (they say) would haue down. And Cassibelan himselfe despairing of happy successe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not aboue 4. thousand wagons, And fearing the Romans further approch, fortified the riuer Thamisis (then passable only in one place) with sharpned stakes bound about with lead, and driuen so deepe into the bottome, that Beda and Affer report them so to remaine in their times. All which notwithstanding the Romans passed with the repulse of their enemies, and Cæsar, who grew now to the height of his honour, marched further into the Continent, and comming forward, was met by ambassadours from the chiefest Citie of the Trinobants, which first of all the States proffered submission. and promised subiection, with this intreaty also, that Mandubrace (who being Cæsars follower, and doubtlesse the contriuer of this submission) might be Gouernour of their City.

S. Albans besieged by Cæsar.

Thither Cæsar came, and with little losse or labour won the place, and many of the miserable Britaines both taken and slaine. Cassibelan now despairing of his owne power, farre vnable to match and much lesse to ouermatch his Enemies, instigated the Gouernours of Kent: being foure in number, Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximangulus, and Segonax, (whom Cæsar termeth Kings) to raise all their strengths, and suddenly to set vpon the Romans Campe that guarded their ships; which enterprise was accordingly attempted, but with such successe, that the Britaines were on each side slaine, and Cingetorix taken prisoner, the rest sauing themselues by flight.

The Gouernours of Kent ioyne with Cassibelan against Cæsar.

(10) Cassibelan beholding these vnfortunate proceedings, feared the end of vnhappy successe, for hee saw his Country wasted, his owne designes defeated, and himselfe forsaken by the traiterous reuolt of many Cities and States on euery side. Therefore as bootlesse to bandy against fortune, he sought to hold his owne with others, and sent Comius King of the Attrebatij to be his meane to Cæsar for peace, which was the willinglier heard and granted, for that Princes great valour, and that Cæsar determined to winter in Gallia, his affaires so requiring it.

Cassibelan solliciteth for peace.

(11) The conditions were hard, but necessity must be obeyed: for Cæsar imposed a greeuous Tribute to bee taxed of the Britaines, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yeerely to be payed, and moreouer included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Trinobantes, taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; and lastly, that these Couenants should bee faithfully obserued, hee commanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be deliuered. These things thus compounded, he took the Seas, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arriued in the Continent of Gallia; hauing rather shewed the place to posterities, then deliuered to the Romans, the possession thereof, as Tacitus sayth, supposing it his glory sufficient to vndergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his comming to Rome, to haue presented his British Captiues; whose strangenesse for attire and

(12) I am not ignorant that the Britiſh Writers doe vary from Cæſar in relating theſe his proceedings, and ſpeake more honourably of their own reſiſtance then himſelfe hath ſet downe, namely that by the valour of Caſsibelan their King, in his firſt attempts hee was twice driuen backe without his purpoſe, and forced to take the Seas, to the great hazard of his ſhips and men, yea and with the loſſe of his owne ſword, which with great proweſſe was woonne from him in a ſingle encounter by Nenion, Caſsibelans brother. And ſurely howſoeuer Polydore accounteth their ſtory new, and Cæſar carrieth himſelfe gloriouſly in his owne affaires; yet by ſundry other renowned writers it ſeemeth, that the currant of his Conqueſt went nothing ſo ſmooth and vntroubled, or with ſo little loſſe of the Romanes, nor the Britaines liberties forgone by ſo eaſie reſiſtance: which may be collected euē out of ſome couert paſſages of Cæſars owne words, where it appeareth, that hee durſt not at ſundry times giue the Britaines battell, though they were onely harneſſed in leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long ſeruice, called for their huge armour, Milites grauis armaturæ, as hauing helmet, corſlet, and boots, all of maſſy braſſe or iron, with a large target, a ſtrong two edged ſword, and a great ſtaffe or clubbe headed with an iron pike; which oddes notwithſtanding had not Caſsibelan been vndermined by Mandubrace, and traiterouſly forſaken (which Cæſar himſelfe confeſſeth) by the Princes which promiſed him aſſiſtance, perhaps Cæſar might haue miſſed this parcel of his glory for all theſe helpes, Lucan ſayth expreſly of him.

Eutropius ſayth, He was wearied out and quelled both with the fierce battels of the enemy, and croſſes of tempeſts. Tacitus ſaith, He found out Britanny for the Romanes, but could not win it for them: which was the very cauſe why (as Dion witneſſeth) for twenty yeers after Cæſars entrance, Britanny kept their own Kings and their own Lawes, and had no forraine Prefects to cōmand them. And Beda ſheweth that Cæſar in this Land was both receiued with ſharpe and ſore fight, and weakened by the loſſe of his ſhips, and with the moſt part of his men at armes. Tacitus alſo vſing the ſpeech of Caractacus to his Souldiers hath theſe words: He called (ſayth he) vpon the names of his Anceſtors, which chaſed Cæſar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whoſe valor they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioyed freely their wiues & childrens bodies vndefiled. Againe in the conſultations of the Britains intending a reuolt, hee alleageth their arguments, whereof one was the ſudden departure of Cæſar out of this Iland, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Caſsius alſo agreeth, affirming that Cæſar got nothing in Britaine beſides the honor and renown of that voiage, & ſight of that Country, vntill then vnknowne to the Romans. And againe (ſaith hee) Cæſar departed thence hauing done no memorable act, which cauſed the Britains to be ſecure and careleſſe to prouide themſelues againſt his ſecond arriuage. Whereby is apparant (euen by Romane writers) both the bold reſiſtance that the Britaines made, and the deare ſubiection that the Romans bought. But in matters ſo farre paſt, it is hard for me to auouch any thing reſoluedly, vnleſſe I could meet with that aged Britaine whom *M. (14) Such was that of Spurina his diuiner, that forewarned him of great danger, which should not passe the Ides of March. And Suetonius out of Cornelius Balbas reporteth, that in the ancient Monuments of Capua, discouered but few months before, was found a Table of brasse, wherein was written the manner of his murder, and the reuenge that should follow: his owne dreames the night before, wherein he seemed to flie in the clouds, and to shake hands with Iupiter: as also his wiues, that thought him stabbed in her armes, and to lie all bloody in her bosome. Besides many other obseruances both of beastes and birds, and that in such plenty, as it yeelded sufficient matter for Ouid the Poet to furnish and fil vp the latter part of his last booke of Metamorphosis. His feature, qualities, and fortunes are by them thus described: Of personage to be tall, strong, and well limmed, faire, and full faced, with blacke eyes, and bald headed, to couer which hee vsually wore the Triumphant Laurell Garland. Hee was well learned, and therewithall very eloquent: and although so great a warriour, thirsting after fame, yet would he be easily reconciled to his enemies, yea and often times seeke the meanes first himselfe. And hee held it no lesse valour to subdue his wrath, then his enemy; as likewise in his disasters hee was of great temper and moderation, insomuch that Seneca writeth of him, that whiles he was in Britaine, hearing newes of his daughters death (which was lamented as a great losse to the whole State) he conquered that sorrow as easily and as quickly as he subdued all things where euer he came. And of his other moderateness, Cotas (who then held the second place of honour and command in the Army) writeth, that though Cæsar was then so great and glorious a Commander, yet hee was so farre from outward pompe, as that when he came into Britaine he had only three seruants to attend him.

(15) In his enterprises he was both valiant and fortunate, and is therefore singled out for an Idea or Paterne of an absolute Generall, especially for foure military properties very resplendent in him: first, laboriousnesse in his affaires: secondly, courage in his dangers: thirdly, industrious contriuing of what he vndertooke: fourthly, quicke dispatch in accomplishing what hee had once begun: In all which he proceeded with such successe, that in fifty seuerall battels by him fought, he alwayes preuailed, one only excepted, as both Pliny, Solinus, and others haue recorded. Foure times, hee was created Consul, and fiue times entred Rome in triumph, bearing still the stile of Perpetual Dictator. And therefore with lesse dishonour did nations subiect themselues vnto him; and this of Britaine with them, whose lot being cast among the hazards of the world, was drawne with an equall chance, as the rest, and yeelded their freedomes with as hard conditions, as did Countries of more extent, and Kingdomes of greater account. But most especially the decree of God could not be gaine-stood, who had foreshewed by his Prophets the rising of these Chittims, and them a meanes to make the metalline image dust.

Chapter II.

AFter the death of Cæsar, thus slaine in the Senate, Octauian (the grand-childe of Iulia Cæsars sister) whom he had adopted and declared his heire, returned vnto Rome from Apollonia, wher he studied Philosophy, intending to prosecute the reuenge of Cæsars death; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius, a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their Complices, for the murder of his vncle, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose eies also Cæsars wounds seemed yet to bleed.

(2) These factions thus begun, grew to such height, that in the Senate house, their causes were pleaded, and by the instigation and eloquence of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius was proclaimed enemie to the State: against whom Octauian was sent, with Ensignes of Consul, and title of Proprætor, being yet not twenty yeeres of age; which duty and office hee so well discharged in the parts of a valiant Captaine, that Antony was forced out of the field, albeit in this battell the one Consul was slaine, and the other deadly wounded. For which seruice so effected, he entred Rome in Triumph; though the glory therof was much blemished, being obtained but in an inteſtine and ciuill warre. Marcus Antonius, to recouer himselfe, and to make good his cause, ioined friendship with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Captaine of the horse, who together interposed themselues against Octauians proceedings; but by mediation of friends all three were reconciled, and iointly erected that forme of gouernment which thence was named the Triumuirat: for the establishment whereof they had seuerall iurisdictions assigned them: to Lepidus Africa, whereof he was present Gouernour: to Antony, the Countries as well of Greece as Asia, that lay betwixt the Ionian Sea, entring at the gulfe of Venice, vnto the riuer Euphrates: and vnto Octauiã all these West parts of Europe amongst which this our Britaine was one.

(3) In these ciuill broiles, and bandings of great men (as Tacitus termeth it) the State of Britaine lay long forgotten, and stood in peaceable termes, Augustus thinking it wisedome (saith he) to restraine the infinite desire of inlarging the Romane Empire, whose extent was grown to that vast greatnesse, as it seemed euen burdensome vnto it selfe, whereby this remote Iland lay ouershadowed from their sight: whereunto may be added, that the presence of Kimbeline the British King (as their history recordeth) in great fauour with Octauian, was a great furtherance to the peace, euen without paiment of the former imposed Tribute. But yet the truth is (as Dion Cassius hath it) that Octauian desirous in all things to bee like vnto Cæsar, seeing their tribute neglected, had intended a voyage towards Britaine; but hauing set forwards into Gallia, lia, he had there tidings of the ſudden reuolt of the Pannonians, againſt whom he diuerted his prepared power, and left his firſt deſignement for that time. Notwithſtanding, hee ſtill retained the deſire of their ſubiection, and foure yeeres after made a ſecond very great preparation thitherward, proceeding with his power againe into Gallia,

(4) The Britaines that had felt the force of the Romanes, & in regard of their owne diſtractions at home, were hopeleſſe of ſtrength to withſtand them, ſought the fauour of Auguſtus by their ſubmiſſion, and to that end ſent ouer their Ambaſſadors, who preſenting themſelues before him in Gallia Celtica, appeaſed his wrath, with promiſe of obedience and full ſatisfaction for their Tributes detained: whereby Cæſar was again ſtaied, and the Britaines taken into fauour and protection. Notwithſtanding the mindes of their Magiſtrates were ſo vnconſtant, or elſe the mony ſo hardly drawn from the people, who naturally hated all ſuch obliged ſeruitudes, hauing euer liued a free Nation, (as Aegyſippus ſpeaketh of them that they againe failed their paiment; wherat Auguſtus was ſore offended, and the third time prepared his voyage that way, which yet a while was hindred by the reuolt of the Byſcayans, and ſome other Prouinces.

(5) The Britaines ſeeing themſelues thus ſtill ſought after, ſent vnto Cæſar their excuſes, with preſents to be offered in the Capitoll to the Romane gods, hauing now learned with the reſt of the world to appeaſe Princes by gifts and rewards, yeelding part of the Iland, and ſwearing him fealty in the Temple of Mars, and ſo were regiſtred ſubiects to the Romane Empire. At which time alſo they agreed to pay tolles and cuſtomes for all wares which they tranſported into other parts, their merchandize chiefly conſiſting of ſmall Iuory boxes, Iron Chaines, and other trifles of Amber and Glaſſe. All which agreements and compoſitions were afterward ſo loyally obſerued, and the Land ſo compoſed to quietneſſe, that one band of ſouldiers, with a ſmall troope of horſe (as Strabo ſayth) or foure Legions (as Ioſephus writeth) were ſufficient to containe ſo great a multitude in a ſetled forme of obedience.

(6) Ouer the Trinobantes, the greateſt and moſt potent State of the Britains, then raigned the happy Prince Cunobeline (for ſo in his Coynes yet remaining wee find it) corruptly written Kimbeline, the ſon of Theomantius, nephew to Caſſibelan before ſpoken of, whoſe abode and principall ſeat was Camalodunum, as by the reuerſe of the ſayd Coynes may appeare. This Prince to make his eſtate more reſpectiue, cauſed his owne Image to bee ſtamped thereon after the manner of the Romanes, (who now had newly taken vp that faſhion) his paiments before conſiſting for the moſt part in rings of iron, and plates of braſſe, ſeized at a certaine waight which vſually paſſed for currant amongſt the Britaines, as Cæſar reporteth, and as thoſe rings are yet witneſſes, whereof we haue ſeene ſome.

This man trained his people to a more ciuill life then formerly had been accuſtomed, and enioyed peace with the reſt of the world, which then ſtood vniuerſally in quiet, as waiting the coming of that Prince of peace, whoſe going forth had beene from euerlaſting, and of whoſe Kingdome there ſhall be no end; euen Chriſt the anointed Emmanuel and ſonne of the liuing God: ſo long before expected, and now in the fulneſſe of time manifeſted: at whoſe birth warre went downe, as Virgil ſpeaketh, or rather to vſe the words of the Prophet, when ſwords were made into mattocks, and ſpeares broken into ſithes: and as in the building of Salomons Temple, neither noiſe of axe, nor the ſound of hammer was heard, ſo his body being the true Temple, he came and was incarnate at ſuch time, when the ſound of war did not awake the world, but a calme and quiet peace incompaſſed it, as by the Angels was proclaimed amongſt the Iewes, & now was more publikely made knowne amongſt the Gentiles by the ſhutting of Ianus Temple in Rome. This vniuerſall peace was ſo famous and ſo admirable, that it found matter for the fineſt wits amongſt the Heathens to enlarge themſelues: whereupon Virgil framing the perſwaſions of Iupiter to his daughter, foreſheweth the happy ſucceſſe of her ſeede, and in what tranquillity they ſhould ſit, when the hands of Mars were thus reſtrained from fight, as he thus expreſſeth.

Our Sauiour Christ borne in the foureteenth yeere of Cunobeline.

In which Ecloge are sweetly couched many other most diuine allusions to our Sauiours [1] Deity, [2] birth and humanity, [3] pouerty, [4] graces, [5] crosses, [6] kingdome, and [7] redemption of the world from [8] sinne, [9] death, and [10] hell.

So likewise Marcus Tullius Cicero saw in his dreame (as himselfe reporteth) a child of an ingenuous and beautifull countenance, let downe from heauen by a golden chaine. And Suetonius in the life of Augustus from Iulius Marathus hath obserued, that certaine predictions in Rome happening, were so respected and generally expounded, That nature was about to bring forth a King that should raign ouer the whole world. And albeit these & other Heathen Writers ascribe these things either to Augustus himselfe, or to some of his fauourites, yet wee see them accomplished in none other but Iesus Christ the Messiah our blessed Sauiour, in whom only the Kingdome of God began, with the vtter subuersion of all their heathenish Oracles, which at his birth, or at furthest at his death ceased all, and gaue place to HIS eternity. Which time of his birth by the Scriptures most certaine account, was from the worlds creation, 3927. and is set by the Britaines in the fourteenth of their Cunobelines raigne, and by other authenticke Writers in the two and fortieth of Augustus Cæsar, euen in the top of that Empires greatnesse, when Rome was with an vniuersall subiection acknowledged the absolute Lady of the knowne earth. For so in S. Luke we read, that this Augustus then first taxed the world. (7) This Emperour raigned in great honour the space of fifty six yeeres, and was obeyed both by the Eastern Indians, and the Northern Scythians, with the subiection of the Parthians, a fierce and vntamed people, and generally with the loue of all. He was a Prince indued with great wisedome, magnanimity and Iustice; yet faulty in this, that he tooke from Tiberius Nero his wife Liuia, both great with child, and hauing also formerly borne him a sonne. Deuout he was in the worship of the Romane gods; amongst whom in the Capitoll he built an Altar vnto the Hebrew childe, with this inscription; The Altar of the first begotten Sonne of God: being thereunto mooued by the Oracle of Apollo, that had answered his owne destruction by the birth of this childe. Of Stature hee was but low, and of a good complexion, gray-eied, his haire somewhat yellow, and his body freckled with spots, which as his flatterers would haue the world beleeue, were in forme like starres. Predictions fore shewing his gouernment & death are alleged, the which I willingly ouerpasse, holding most of them rather fantasies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the standers by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life vpon the stage of this world: & died fourteene yeeres after Christ his incarnation; leauing after him so honourable an estimatiō of his glory, that as the succeeding Emperors in remembrance of Iulius Cæsar gloried to be called Cæsars, so they euer held the name of Augusti to be sacred and only befitting persons destinated to imperiall Maiesty. And both their names were inserted in the yeers moneths, that the honour of them both might neuer perish while Times euiternity indured.

Tiberius Nero his parents.

Augustus Cæsar thus gloriously raigning, and peaceably dying, had ordained for his succeſſour Tiberius Nero, the ſonne of Tiberius the Patritian, and of Liuia his wife, whom (as we ſaid before) hee had taken for his Empreſſe, and by whoſe incitements and continuall inſtigations it was procured: though Suetonius attributeth it vnto Auguſtus his owne ambition, to make himſelfe the ſooner miſſed, and the more lamented, in leauing his vnlike to ſucced, whoſe cõditions as they ſtood vpon their owne baſis, hee knew to bee reproouеable, and contemptible:

(2) But before the death of Cæſar could be diuulged, to write his imperiall ſtile as it were in bloud, he began with the murder of young Agrippa, the ſonne of Iulia, daughter to Octauian, and once his owne wife, and continued his raign with ſuch tyranny and murther, that many he ſlaughtred, without reſpect of perſon or cauſe; and in his looſeſt laſciuiouſneſſe, thought of nothing but how to ſubuert the Nobility; for rare it was in his dayes that any ſuch died a naturall death: and maintaining a race of men (Promoters, as Tacitus tearmes them, found out for a common ouerthrow and deſtruction of others) allured them by rewards to accuſe the rich, though guiltleſſe; only this fauor granted to the condemned, that if they ſlew themſelues before the day of execution, their bodies ſhould haue burial their goods at their owne diſpoſe, and their teſtament ſtand good in law.

(3) A great diſſembler he was, ſeeming euer to hate thoſe vices which in truth he loued, and to loue thoſe vertues which he did moſt deadly hate: and for life and libidinous filthineſſe ſo extreme, that a Chriſtians pen may not expreſſe, when the Heathen themſelues doe bluſh to name ſuch things as he ſhamed not openly to commit: his publike drunkenneſſe, and continuall banquettings, whereat hee ſpent whole daies and nights together with out intermiſſion, cauſed exchange of names from Tiberius Nero to * Biberius Mero. And moſt certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in ſubiection, yet were well affected to the Romans, as appeared by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, & in releeuing their ſhipwracked ſouldiers, that in croſſing the Seas were by tempeſt driuen vpon their Coaſts, and courteouſly ſent thence by their petty Kings vnto Germanicus their Generall. (5) Other remembrances of these times concerning vs, finde we none, besides that which is common to al, namely the death of our Sauiour Christ, which vnder this Tyrant, and in his eighteenth yeere was accomplished by the proceeding of his (as wicked) Deputy Pontius Pilate, who both adiudged him to die, and to bee guiltlesse of deseruing death: whereby was wrought the mystery of our Redemption, with such signes and euidences of his Deity, that the wicked Iudge himselfe wrote thereof to Tiberius, and he to the Senate, to haue him consecrated among the Roman Gods. Which they refused to doe, that the wisedome and diuine power of God in the doctrine of Saluation should not need the allowance and commendation of men, as Eusebius hath well obserued.

(6) Finally, when hee had raigned (hated of all men) the space of three and twenty yeeres, with no better liking then is read of Ioram King of Iudah, that liued without being desired, hee was smothered to death (as is thought) by Caligula, the seuenteenth Kalends of April, the yeere from Christs Nativity thirty nine, and the seuenty eight of his owne age. He was of personage tall, & of body strong, broad chested, and vsed both his hands alike, faire of complexion; but great and goggle-eied, whereby he saw so cleerely, as is incredible to report.

CAIVS CALIGVLA.

CHAPTER V.

NExt vnto Tiberius, succeeded his nephew Caius Caligula, the sonne of Germanicus the sonne of Drusus. His mother was Agrippina, the daughter of Iulia, Cæsars wife; and his coynes as thou seest aboue, being rather liked for his fathers vertues, (who was for learning, vertue, valour & courtesie, the most admired man of that age) then for any parts of his owne answerable to so high a place, as being neither naturally framed for good presence in Throne, nor qualified in minde for an Imperiall Command. Euer in condition opposite to all, & (which is more) most times to himselfe. One while lasciuiously prodigall, in excessiue banquets, and admirable Sea-workes, with needlesse leuelling of mountaines, and filling vp their vallies: Another while extreamely couetous, imposing taxes vpon the Prouinces, & exacting gaines out of the base earnings of pollutions of harlots: Alwaies cruel & libidinous. His owne mother he defamed to be incestuously begotten: his grandmother hee poisoned; his brother Tiberius he murdered; his three naturall sisters hee polluted incestuously, & vpō Drusilla the second so incredibly doted, that he vsed to sweare by her sacred name, & deified her for a Goddesse by the name of Panthea, cōmanding diuine honors to be done vnto her. The like deity cōceited hē of himselfe, causing his Statue to be worshipped, and placed in his vsuall roabes amongst the Roman Gods; and would haue it set in Ierusalems Temple, (as Iosephus recordeth) had not that great God cut him off by death. His Imperiall gouernment was without either inlargement of circuit, or inforcing by armes a dutifull subiection, rather seeking to make himselfe feared by Tyranny at home, then any wayes famous by Acts abroad.

it should seeme the Britains and Germans were not his best subiects: for these are his words, that Caius had a meaning to invade Britaine, it is certainly knowen: but his rashrunning head, and hasty repentance in his attempts against Germany, turned all to nothing. And Suetonius ascribes the foolish erection of that admirable bridge ouer a creeke of the Sea in Campania (whereof Dion writeth at large) to his vaine glorious cõceit, that by a brute blazed abroad of so huge and monstrous a worke, hee might terrifie Germany and Britaine, vpon which Countries hee meant to make warre. The issue wherof was as fruitlesse as his great cost was ridiculous. For hauing set forward for the conquest of Britaine with no small preparation, hee proceeded no further then to those parts of Holland that confront against Northfolke, where he suddenly pitched his tents and stayed.

(3) At which time, Adminius the sonne of Cunobelin King of Britaine being banished by his father, fled ouer Sea with a small power, & submitted himselfe vnto Cæsars protection: whereupon Caligula wrote vaunting letters to the Senate, as if the whole Iland had beene yeelded into his hands: cõmanding the messenger that his letters should be carried in a Chariot into the Curia, and not deliuered but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent and full assembly of the Senate. And hauing no further matter to worke vpon, he caused certaine German prisoners secretly to bee conueied into a wood, & word to bee brought him in great feare and amazement of the sudden approch of the enemie; against whom with shew of great manhood & noble resolution in all haste & warlike manner he marched, and in chaines openly shewed them as his captiues taken in warre, forbidding the Senators the wonted celebration of their Feasts or to enter their Theaters to take solace, seeing their Cæsar exposed himselfe to so many perils, & fought so great battels with hazard of his life. Last of al, as if he had ment to make a finall dispatch for euer of that warre, hee drew his forces down to the Sea-coast of Belgia, and embattailed his army vpon the Ocean shoare, planting his baliists and other Engines of artillery in their seuerall places, no man witting what he meant: which done, himselfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, caused the Trumpets to sound the battle, and commanded his Souldiers forthwith to fall a gathering of cockles & muscles into their helmets, terming them the Spoiles of the conquered Ocean: Against which hee also built a Tower, as a Trophey of his victory, the ruines whereof as yet remaine in Holland to this day, and is called The Britons house in memory of that fantasticall seruice: vpon which exploit hee made a glorious Oration to his souldiers, commending & requiting their valours with rewards, & auowing their shell-spoils worthy offrings to bee presented in the Capitoll, writing letters to Rome of this his great Conquest, and demanding Triumph, and diuine honours to bee assigned him: which when the Senatours made some question of, he threatned them with death. But this Sea-seruice (as it seemeth) so ran euer after in his minde, that one night hee dreampt that the Sea in dreadfull shape came and expostulated with him, which cast him into an incredible horrour and affright.

(5) And now both the Ambition and cruelty of Caius was growen so intolerably sauage, as that he often lamented that some rare and vnusuall disaster (as either some horrible slaughter of huge Armies, or some vniuersall plague, or famine, or fire, or opening of the earth, or ouer-flowing of the Sea) happened not in his time, wherby his raigne might be made memorable to posterity. And he wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he might haue the glory of giuing the braue stblow that euer was giuen, whereby so infinite multitudes of men might be killed by him at one stroke. But this his wish was preuented by a blow on himselfe, his death and downefall being complotted and executed by certaine Tribunes, whereof Cherea was chiefe; who following him from the Theater with resolution for the fact, took the time when Caligula, turning suddenly aside into a narrow Cloister to see certaine boyes sent him out of Asia, lost the defense of his fore-warders, and the straitnesse of the place permitted not his gard to follow, on which aduantage Cherea demãded his watch-word, which he (according to his vsuall manner) gaue in great disdaine and scorne, whereunto

(6) He was of ſtature tall, of complexion pale & wan, of body ſomewhat groſſe and vnfaſhionable, his necke and legges exceedingly ſlender, his eyes ſunke into the hollow temples of his forehead, and that alſo frowning and full of wrinkles: his haire was thin and ſhaggy, but bald on the crowne, though otherwiſe ſo hairy of body, that all the time of his raigne, if a man, did but name a Goat, it was held a touch, & offēce of Læſæ Maieſtatis againſt his imperiall perſon. His Countenance naturally ſterne and grimme, which by cōpoſing and geſture he purpoſely made more vgly & terrible. His apparel alwayes coſtly, but not alwaies Courtlike, neither ciuil: his beard he wore of gold like Iupiter or Æſculapius. CHAPTER VI.

Claudius Druſus Emp.

Aulus Plautius Lieut.

Claudius his parentage.

BVt Claudius Druſus a man of better ſpirit and temperature, immediately vpon the death of Caligula, and euen in the height of thoſe diſturbances, by the Pretorian Souldiers (who were encamped neer the walles of Rome) was nominated and choſen Emperor; wheras the Senate had decreed & determined to reduce the City into her ancient liberty, without admiſſion of any Cæſar, or ſubiection to ſuch abſolute and ſole authority; notwithſtanding, the power of this Army ſo prenailed, that the election was confirmed, & the Imperiall dignity by him aſſumed, as the next & only man to whom it muſt of right belong: whoſe father Druſus was the ſonne of Liuia, wife to Octauius, from whom the Emperours ſucceeding held it a glory to be any wayes allied.

Claudius Druſus choſen by the Pretorian Souldiers.

Ioſeph Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 3.

The Britaines detaine their Tribute.

(2) In his firſt proceedings with the Prouinces affaires hee determined warre againſt the Britaines, whoſe Tribute had beene a long time neglected, and whoſe ſubiection was now to bee feared: all of them being raiſed in a tumultuous vprore. The cauſe pretended was certaine fugitiues, (the betrayers of the State and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans receiued with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moued them to great diſcontents, and ſerued as a ſhew for their iuſt reuolt.

Dio. Caſſ. lib 60 An. Do. 45.

(3) Claudius, as ready to preuent the worſt, being thereto further incited by Bericus one of thoſe Britiſh fugitiues as Dion reporteth, in the ſecond yeere of his Empire, and from Chriſts Nativity forty fiue, ſent Aulus Plautius a Roman Senator, well experienced in the affaires of warre, to take charge of the Army remaining in Gallia, and with thoſe old trained Souldiers to make ouer into Britaine to retaine their obedience. Which ſeruice vpon them thus impoſed, was generally diſtaſted, as apparantly was ſhewed by their vnwillingneſſe thitherward, muttering mutteringand complaining, that they muſt now be inforced to make warre out of the world, and protracting time could hardly be drawne forward, though the Emperour ſent his ſecond command.

(4) But being at laſt embarked and croſſing the Seas, their ſhippes were beaten with contrary winds, which ſtill added diſcouragements vnto their proceedings, and had not an accident the ſame time happened, the edge of their courage had beene more abated: for euen in this diſtraction ſuddenly a fiery leame ſhot it ſelfe from East to West, the ſame way that their ſhippes made ſaile: which preſently gaue hopes to their deſpairing hearts, being heathenißhly interpreted for a ſigne of good lucke, & ſo ſent from their Gods, whereupon without any reſiſtance, they came to ſhoare and tooke land.

Incouraged by a ſigne from heauen.

(5) The Britaines that miſtruſted no ſuch ſudden inuaſion, and now thus ſurpriſed vnawares, diſperſedly ſecured themſelues in woods and mariſhes, thereby to detract time, and the more to weary the Enemy by delaies: which thing Plautius well perceiued, and with much labour and hazard followed ſo extreamely that many he ſlew, and took priſoner Catacratus their Captaine, the ſon of Cunobeline but lately deceaſed, which brought ſuch terrour amongſt the Britaines, that thereupon the BODVNI, the inhabitants of Oxford and Gloceſterſhires, yeelded themſelues to Plautius deuotion: for which ſeruice thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs: and it is probable that this defeat of the Britain forces, and ſurpriſe of their King, fell out in the ſixt yeare of this Emperours raigne, by the reuerſe of his money then minted with a triumphall arch and inſcription, De Britan: as aboue is ſeene.

Catacratus taken priſoner.

Tacitus in vita Agric.

(6) But he following ſtill the Enemy, being ſeconded by Flauius Veſpaſian (afterward Emperour) the leader of the ſecond Legion (the foundation of whoſe ſucceeding fortunes was firſt laid here in Britaine) gaue them againe another ouerthrow. The chiefeſt meanes whereof was a policy they had gotten to gall the Chariot horſes, whereby their riders were maiſtered, and their whole powers diſordered: many Britaines in this battaile were ſlaine, and more in danger, had not the night ended the skirmiſh.

(7) The next day the battell was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equall aduantage, til C. Sidius Geta enforced the Britains to retire, whereby the victory reſted in the Romans: for which exploit Triumphall honours were aſſigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Conſular degree. In this conflict Veſpaſian hardly eſcaped, being ſore oppreſſed by the Enemy, and in ſuch ſort, that had not Titus (his renowned ſonne) come to reſcue, he had beene ſlaine, whoſe valour afterwards was tried in one and thirty battailes, & in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight.

C. Sidius Geta his valour.

(8) After this conflict the Britains withdrew themſelues into places of more aduantage, and in the mouth of Thamiſis neere her fall into the Sea, paſſed the ſhallowes and firme grounds in ſafety, whereas the Romans ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their diſtreſſed paſſages were ſharply aſſailed by the Enemy, in which turmoile, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodumnus a Britiſh Prince, brother to Catacratus, and ſonne to Cunobeline was ſlaine: Notwithſtanding the courage of the Britaines was nothing abated, but rather exaſperated to a further reuenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people aſſembled from each part of the Ile. Plautius the Lieutenant ſeeing daily the increaſe of their power, Veſpaſian imployed in other parts, & himſelfe ſtraitned in a place of danger, proceeded no further, but ſent word to the Emperour of the doubtfull eſtate of their affaires.

The Britaines retire to places of aduantage.

(9) At that time (ſayth Suetonius) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he ſuppoſing that ſuch a bare title of honour was inferiour to the Maieſty of an Emperour, and willing of himſelfe alſo to enterpriſe ſome exploit whereby hee might winne the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Prouinces, of Britaine, attempted by none ſince Iulius Ceſar of famous memory. And with great ſtrength entred into the journey, hauing with him a mighty Army both of horſe and foot, as alſo Elephants, a beaſt of great bigneſſe and burthen, whoſe ſtrangeneſſe then amazed the Britaines, and whoſe

(10) With very great danger he paſſed the Seas, and ioining ſtrength with his Lieutenant and Veſpaſian, they altogether croſſed the Riuer Thamiſis, where preſently they were encountred by the Britains, who a while maintained the battaile very deſperately, but in the end gaue place & fled, whom the Romans purſued euen to their ſtrong Camulodunum, then the ſeate of Adminius, Cunobelines ſonne, as may aptly be coniectured by the Medul of Britannicus the Emperours darling, figured in the front of this Chapter; which City they ſurpriſed and fortified with their owne Garriſons, and the Emperour afterwards in the eleuenth of his raigne (as appeareth by the other coyne) turned to a Colony of Romane Citizens. Claudius now diſarming the Britaines, remitted further puniſhment either vpon their bodyes or confiſcation of their goods: The which his fauourable clemency moued thoſe diſtreſſed Britaines to ſuch liking and loue, as they erected a Temple and Altar in his name, and gaue him diuine honour, as a God: The reſt, as vnable to reſiſt, proffered their ſubmiſſions, and promiſed a peaceable ſubiection vnto the Romans gouernment.

Claudius returns to Rome and entreth in Triumph. Suet. in vita Claud ſect. 17.

(11) Theſe things thus atchieued, at the end of ſixe moneths Claudius in his ninth yeere returned and entred Rome in triumph with more then vſuall manner, ſtamping againe vpon his monies his arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of our ſeruitude. After whoſe Triumphant Chariot rode Meſſalina his wife, the Monſter of her ſexe for impudency & laſciuious life: and vpon the top of his Palace he placed a Nauall Coronet in memoriall of the Ocean by him ſailed ouer, and therefore by his flatterers ſaid to be ſubdued; withall aſſuming to himſelfe, and ſonne, the Sirname Britannicus: And honoured Plautius with his preſence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giuing him the right hand, aſcending the Capitoll, & beſides graced diuers Captaines that ſerued vnder him in that warre with Triumphall ornaments. So great an eſteeme was held of the Conqueſt of ſo ſmall a part of this Iland.

The Britiſh Hiſtorians vary in relating Claudius doings in Britaine.

(12) The Britiſh Hiſtorians relate theſe things farre otherwiſe, reporting that their King Aruiragus, the yongeſt ſonne of Kymbeline, withſtood Claudius in his enterpriſe, with whom (ſay they) hee came to compoſition by giuing him his daughter Geniſſa in marriage, in memory whereof, he built the City Glauceſter, according to his name; which now is called Gloceſter: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wiues and children nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonia, and Octauia, without mention of Geniſſa at all, and therefore not likely to haue any ſuch. And Dion Caſſius reporteth, that Claudius himſelfe ſtayed not aboue ſixteen dayes in Britain, a time too ſhort for the ſending to Rome, and thence for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of ſo great a City as Gloceſter is. Neither indeede was Aruiragus knowne in the dayes of Claudius: But rather liued in the time of Domitian the ſeuenth in ſucceſſion after him, as plainely appeareth by Iuuenal the Poet, in thoſe his verſes ſpoken to Domitian, which elſwhere wee cited. Whereby appeareth that the ſtirres of this King could not accord with Claudius raigne, and that the truth of this report is much weakned from more ſufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lieutenant authoriſed ouer the Britaines) vpon ſome occaſion was thence reuoked, the warres not quieted, and with a ſmall Triumph (as Tacitus ſaith) entred Rome. Vnto him ſucceeded P. Oſtorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferiour, who at his firſt landing found all in an vprore: Of whoſe proceedings let vs heare Tacitus ſpeake: The Britains (ſayth hee) that were not yet conquered, ranged the countries of the confederates, preſuming both vpon the approach of the winter, and the Propretors vnacquaintance with his Army: But he knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe breedeth either feare or confidence, gathered the Cohorts, and made towards the Enemy, ſlaying all that made head againſt him, and diſarming thoſe whom hee moſt ſuſpected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King as ſtricter aſſurance and fidelity to the Emperour, granted diuers Cities and States to him by way of Donation.

The firſt that beganne to ſtirre, were the Icenians, the Inhabitants of Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntington-ſhires, a ſtrong people vnſhaken with warres: And with them (at their inſtigation) their neighbours adioyning. Theſe together choſe a fit place to fight, compaſſed in with a rude but defencible trench, which had onely one narrow entrance whereby the Horſemen muſt be much impeached. This Rampire, not withſtanding the Romane Captaine, with the onely aide of the * Allies brake downe, and diſordered the Enemy euen in this their owne fortreſſe, who ſeeing all paſſages for eſcape to bee ſtopped vp, (Oſtorius hauing hemmed them in with Garriſons betweene the Riuers * Antonia and Sabrina) ſhewed great valour in defending themſelues & by their deaths gaue place to the Romanes. This ouerthrow and ſlaughterof the Iceni wrought a more ſtaied reſolution in thoſe that before were wauering betweene warre and peace. And the Army led againſt the Cangi, with waſte and ſpoile conſumed the Country, the inhabitants not daring to bee ſeene in field. Whereupon the Romans pierced thorow the Land, euen vnto the Sea-coaſt that lookes towardes Ireland. A ſmall reſiſtance was made by the Brigantes, but without much trouble ſoone quieted, by the execution of ſome few, and pardoning of the reſt.

Nen in Northamptonſhire, ſaith Cambden.

(13) But the Silures (that is, thoſe of South-wales) could not bee brought to beare the Romiſh yoke of ſubiection, who beſides their owne courage relied much vpon the ſtrength & valour of their Prince Caractacus (whoſe Coyne we haue here expreſſed) a man which had waded thorow many dangers, and in many aduentures both proſperous and lucky, had gotten ſuch reputation, that hee was preferred before all the Britiſh Captaines. This Generall knowing his owne ſtrength vnable to match the enemy, by policy thought to ſupply that want, and hauing aduantage of the Country, remooued the warre vnto the Ordouices, which is now North-Wales, where all ioyned to him that either feared or diſdained to hold peace with the Romans. Heere hee choſe a place to encampe his hoſt, euen on the top of a hill naturally defenced from acceſſe: and where any doubt was, there he ſtopped vp all paſſage with heapes of ſtones in manner of a Rampire; neere the foot where of ran a Riuer with a foord ſomewhat dangerous, and not eaſily found, where a troope of his beſt ſouldiers were ſet in order to receiue the Enemy.

His manner of encamping

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders went about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occaſions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of reſolution: eſpecially Caractacus, who courſing hither and thither, proteſted that day and that battle ſhould bee the beginning either of a recouered liberty, or elſe a perpetuall ſeruitude and bondage: and euer he called vpon the names of his valiant Anceſtors, who formerly had chaſed Cæſar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whoſe valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enio yed freely their wiues and childrens bodyes vndefiled. The Souldiers alſo themſelues ſhewed as great forwardneſſe, and as Echoes redoubled his words, vowing according to the Religion of their Country, neuer to yeeld for wounds or life, which they all were ready to ſacrifice in the the cauſe of their liberties. This their apparant reſolution much appalled the Romans cheerfulnes, and moſt of all the Captaines and Leaders, who before their faces ſaw the Riuer on both ſides of them had the hanging hils, and the fort commodious for the enemy, but deadly vnto them: all which notwithſtanding the common Souldiers deſpiſed, and demanded the battle. Oſtorius, whoſe ſtudy was chiefly to performe the parts of a Generall, paſſed the Riuer with ſome little difficulty, and leading his Army vp to the Rampire, was met with ſuch a ſhowre of darts, that many therewith were wounded and ſlaine. Yet at length breaking downe thoſe rude compacted ſtones, joyned battle with the enemy, and afront came cloſe to handy ſtrokes; wherein the Britaines hauing better courage then armour (for they had neither headpeece nor coat of defence) were ſore galled with their Iauelings and two-handed ſwords, and ſo diſordered, that they betooke themſelues to flight.

The Britaines put to flight.

Caractacus wife, daughter and brethren taken priſoners. Himſelfe betraied by Cartiſmandua. He reſiſted the Romanes nine yeeres. Tacit. Anal. 12 cap. 8.

(14) This victory as it was almoſt vnexpected, ſo was it made famous by the taking of Caractacus wife, daughter, and brethren, and himſelfe flying for ſuccor & protection to the Brigantes, was (as we haue before ſhewed) by Cartiſmandua their Queene betrayed and deliuered into the hands of the Conquerours after his nine yeeres moſt generous reſiſtance. Whereupon his fame being carried ouer the Ilands, and ſpread abroad thorow the Prouinces, was alſo renowned in Italy, and they deſired to ſee him that ſo many yeeres had contemned their forces. Neither was his name meanely eſteemed of at Rome; for whileſt Cæſars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caractacus: and againſt his comming to the City, the people from all parts were aſſembled, as to behold ſome notable and moſt rare ſpectacle. The Emperours Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Captiues and Trophies were carried, and preſented after this manner: firſt the vaſſals of Caractacus going formoſt bowed their bodies to the people as they paſſed, and ſeemed by their ruefull countenances to diſcouer the ſenſe of their calamity. The capariſons, his chaines, and other ſpoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caractacus his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and laſt of all himſelfe, whoſe attire and ſtout behauiour filled the peoples eyes with wonder and delight. His body for the moſt part, was naked, and painted with figures of diuers beaſts. Hee ware a chaine of iron about his necke, & another about his middle: the haire of his head hanging downe in curled lockes, couered his backe and ſhoulders, and the haire of his vpper lip parted on both ſides, lay vpon his breaſt. Neither was his behauiour leſſe noted then the ſtrangeneſſe of his habit: for hee neither hung downe his head as daunted with baſe feare, nor craued mercy, as the reſt; but with a confident ſpirit, and bold countenance, held on till hee came before the Imperiall Seate, where making his ſtand, and a while beholding Cæſars Maieſty, at laſt with great courage ſpake to this purpoſe.

This Conqueſt and Tryumph ouer Caractacus miniſtred matter of diſcourſe and admiration thorough out all Rome, and the Lords of the Senate held it no leſſe honourable, then that of *P. exhibited to the view of the people. Then were alſo publike Triumphall honours decreed for Oſtorius; whoſe fortunes vntill then had beene very proſperous, but now began to bee doubtfull, or rather to decline, either becauſe Caractacus (the foile of his glory) was remoued, and thereupon (as though all had beene ſubdued) a more careleſſe ſeruice entertained, or elſe the courage of the Britaines was more inflamed to reuenge through the feruent compaſſion of the fall of ſo mighty a King.

Oſtorius and his fortunes decline.

The Britaines take heart againe.

(17) For immediately they enuironed the Campmaſter, and the Legionary Cohorts which were left to build fortreſſes in the Country of the Silures, whom with eight Centurions, and the forwardeſt Souldiers, they ſlew, and had put all the reſt to the ſword, if reſcue had not ſpeedily come from the villages & forts adioyning. The Forragers alſo and troope of horſe that were ſent to aide them, they put to flight. Theſe affronts touched Oſtorius to the quick, and leſt their aids ſhould grow to a greater head, he ſent forth certaine light-harneſſed companies, which with the Legionary Souldiers vndertooke the battle and with ſmall oddes was it continued till the night came, and parted them: diuers other skirmiſhes afterwards the Britaines made, though for the moſt part in woods and mariſhes, whence taking their aduantage in ſallying forth, they many times preuailed, ſometimes by ſtrength, ſometimes by meere courage, and ſometimes by chance; neither were they alwayes commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary and without preſſe.

Their victory

(18) The principall motiue that induced the reſt to take Armes, was the example of the Silures, who were moſt reſolutely bent, as beeing exaſperated by certaine ſpeeches that the Roman Emperour himſelfe had vſed, which was, that as the name of the Sugambri was deſtroyed, and the people tranſported into Gallia, ſo the memory of Silures ſhould vtterly bee extinguiſhed: And in this heate, as men deſperate (whoſe deſtinies were read and lots caſt already) they intercepted the ſcattered troopes of the Romanes that vncircumſpectly waſted and ſpoiled the Country, taking of them many priſoners, and recouering rich booties, which they ſent and diſtributed amongſt their neighbours; whereby many other were drawne to reuolt: Theſe proceedings ſate ſo neere Oſtorius his heart, who with long cares and trauels had wearied his ſpirit, ſpent the ſtrength of his body, and thereunto had now added the diſcontentment of his minde, that in theſe vexations hee gaue vp the Ghoſt, the Silures reioycing that ſo worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

Cæſars threats make the Britaines more reſolute.

Oſtorius dieth.

(19) But Claudius Cæſar, leſt the Prouince ſhould make head, ſent preſently Aulus Didius for his Lieutenant into Britaine; where notwithſtanding all his haſte he found all out of frame For Manlius Valens with his Legion had encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe, yet not ſo bad as the Ilanders gaue forth, thinking thereby to terrifie their new eſtabliſhed Gouernour: which report himſelfe alſo in policy was contented to augment; Thereby to purchaſe more praiſe in appeaſing ſo dangerous ſtirres; or if hee could not, to retaine his own credit without his valours impeachment. Theſe reſiſters had made many inroads into the ſubdued Countries; againſt whom vpon his firſt arriuall Didius entred the field, and for a while kept them in awe.

Aulus Didius ſent Lieutenant into Britaine.

Tacit. Anal. 12 cap. 8. Manlius Valens encountered the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe.

Didius for a while keepeth them in awe.

(20) But Venutius a very expert man in Military affaires (truſty to the Romanes, and defended by their power ſo long as the mariage betwixt him and Cartiſmandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartiſmandua (in ſpeciall fauour with the Romans for the deliuery of Caractacus) abounding in wealth, peace, & pleaſures (which commonly are the Nurſes of licentious liuing) fell in loue (as before was touched) with Vellocatus her husbands ſeruant, and harneſſe-bearer, and forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Venutius, and laboured to make him King. The goodwill of the Country notwithſtanding went generally vpō the lawfull husband: who being deepely touched with this open iniury, raiſed a power againſt her and her Paramour. At the firſt this quarrell was onely betwixt them, vntill that Cartiſmandua by policy had taken her husbands brother, and ſome of his nee-reſt kindred priſoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purpoſes, and diſdaining to bee brought vnder the yoake of a woman ſo defamed, declared themſelues for Venutius, and with a choice band of youthfull Souldiers inuaded her Territories: whereof Didius hauing intelligence, ſent certaine Cohorts to ſecond her & encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartiſmandua did preuaile; yet the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warres ſtill vnto them.

Tacit. hiſt lib. 3. cap. 9.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, & a Legion commanded by Cæſius Naſica, fought luckily againſt the Britaines. In all which ſtirres Didius in perſon was abſent, as being ſtricken in yeeres, and hauing receiued many honours, held it ſufficient to execute his charge by the aſſiſtance of others. The State of Britaine thus ſtanding, let vs ſo leaue it during this Emperours raigne, which now began to draw towards his laſt period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her vpon this occaſion.

Tacit. Annal. 12. 8.

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his wine, to caſt forth a word of great ſuſpicion, in ſaying: *That it was fatall vnto him firſt to beare the leaudnes of his * wiues; and then to puniſh them.* She knowing her ſelfe guilty in diſinheriting Britannicus, who was Claudius his owne ſonne, for the adoption of Nero who was hers, beſides other inſolencies wherewith ſhee might be taxed, ſought therefore to cleere her owne way by taking him out of the way, and with Locuſta a woman skilfull in poiſoning, and Zenophon a Phyſition, as large of conſcience, conferred for the manner of his death: who in fine, concluded that poiſon was the ſureſt and the leaſt in ſuſpect, or at leaſtwiſe the moſt difficult to be proued againſt her.

(23) This then reſolued, they temper poiſon in a Muſhrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and ſhortly after ended his life the thirteenth day of October, when he had raigned thirteene yeeres, eight moneths, and twenty dayes, the yeere of Chriſt his incarnation fifty ſixe, and of his owne age ſixty foure. He was of ſtature tall, and of a pleaſing Countenance, full of Majeſty and comely gray haires, his Head continually ſhaking, ſomewhat ſtammering in his ſpeech, very learned, but therwithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wiues, and domeſticall Seruants, the two ordinary banes of moſt men who are aduanced to any eminent place of gouernment and command.

Chapter VII.

THis violent and vnexpected death of Claudius, gaue breath and life vnto Neroes further hopes: for whileſt the Conſuls were aſſembled to make ſupplications for their Prince, (not knowing him already dead) Nero ſuddenly ſet open the Palace gates, and accompanied with ſhouts and acclamations, entred the Cohorts horts that kept the watch, where of them and the rest of the souldiers he was saluted Emperour, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the same.

His parents.

(2) He was the sonne of Domitius Noro and of Iulia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, brother to Claudius the precedent Emperour, vitious by nature, as sprung of those parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius sayd) no goodnesse could proceede: and the same vile disposition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected study, and pursuit of all possible leaudnesse, as one who could well fit his wanton and lasciuious humours to the vnripenesse of his yeeres, being not passing seuenteene when hee assumed the Empire. All religion he had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting loose the reine vnto all vnnaturall lusts, and licentiousnesse of life.

His excessiue lust and blood shed.

(3) For bloud and libidinousnesse hee was held a most vnsatiate fury, and amongst men a very monster of nature. His father he poisoned: vpon his mother he committed both incest and murder; vpon males, pollutions against nature: defloured the Vestals (a matter sacrilegious & impious) slew his brother Germanicus, and his sister Antonia, his wiues, Poppæa and Octauia, his aunt Domitia, his sonne in law, Rufinus, & his renowned Tutor Seneca; With such sauage slaughter of the Romane Nobility, that Tacitus (their best Remembrancer) was wearied to record their names, whilest with a seruile patience (as he termeth it) they died honourably.

Rome set on fire by Nero.

(4) The City Rome hee set on fire, charging the Christians with the fact, and inflicted such torments and death vpon them, that they were pitied of their enemies, and his owne cruelties thereby made more notorious. Whose Religion though Suetonius tearmed new, and a wicked superstition; and Tacitus (as it were in contempt) nameth the Author thereof to be Christ, who in Tiberius raigne (as he with the Euangelists agree) was put to death vnder Pontius Pilate Procurator of Iudea, where that religion first began; yet, by the said authour it is confessed, that these men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burst forth further into many other parts, insomuch that Rome it selfe did affect the same. Yea and in Neroes Court also some embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apostle is manifest, who from the Saints in Cæsars house sent salutations to the Brethren. Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And lastly, to fill vp the measure of his bloudy cruelty, he crucified Peter vpon the Crosse, and beheaded Paul with the sword, two principall Apostles of Iesus Christ, and worthy instruments of the worlds saluation; and forgetting the Maiesty of his estate, fell into the sinke of contempt and all sinnes, giuing his minde leaue to digest all vncleanesse, and his bodie ouer to worke any base exercises, attending nothing besides his Harpes and Harlots, whereby a careless (but yet a cruell) gouernment was intertained, and the Senate fashioning themselues to feed his loose humors, stroue each to outstrip other in their base flatteries.

(6) In this state the Prouinces subiections began to stand doubtfull, and the greatnesse of the Empire to ouercharge the foundation; for the Parthians vnder Vologeses gaue Petus the Roman a great ouerthrow, and that in such wise that those which escaped were tearmed the vnfortunate army. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good successe; for aged Didius could doe no more then keepe that which he had already gotten: and Verrannius his successor, only with small inroades assailing the Silures, was in his first yeere cut off by death, insomuch that Nero hauing neither wil, motion, nor hope to propagate & enlarge the Empire, minded once to haue with-drawen the Romane forces out of Britaine, had it not beene for very shame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the gouernment of that Prouince, in skill for seruice, and opinion of people comparable to any, sought to match his concurrent Corbulo, who with daily victories prospered in Armenia, himselfe wanting neither courage nor discretion to atchieue the like, only matter and occasion the Iland afforded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, he made preparation to inuade the Ile of Mona, now Anglesey, separated from the Continent by the Riuer Menai, and fronted vpon the midst of Ireland, both strong with Inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitiues.

(8) Against his approach the Ilanders had gathered their powers, which stood thicke vpon the shoare ready armed to make resistance, their women running among in mourning weedes, their haire loose and firebrands in their hands, like furies of hell, together with their Druides (men of religion) who with hands and eyes lifted vp towards heauen, cryed for vengeance vengeance, and powred out curſes as thicke as haile. With the ſtrangeneſſe of which ſight, the Romanes ſtood amazed, not offering one ſtroke; ſeeming rather to preſent themſelues for a pray vpon their enemies weapons, then for the Conqueſt of their land or liues: which ſudden and vnexpected diſcouragement, their Captaine ſoone redreſſed, by putting them in remembrance of their wonted valours, which now was farre ouermatchable vnto a fearefull flock of weak women, or a company of rude and frantick men: whervpon their Enſignes were diſplaid, and the Enemy preſently diſperſed and ſlaine, themſelues becomming maſters both of the field, and whole Ile: which no ſooner was thus obtained, but ſudden newes came to recall their powers, the Prouinces being raiſed to a preſent reuolt, Romans amazed at the ſight of the Britiſh.

(9) For the Britaines in abſence of the Generall, laid open their publique greeuances, growne now both common and intolerable by the oppreſſions of the Romans, who from the diſeaſes of their Head, had ſucked and diſperſed their corruptions, throughout the Prouinces of the Empire: and Catus Decianus the Procurator here in Britaine, renewed the confiſcation of their goods, which Claudius had formerly remitted. The Romane Colonie at Camulodunum, thruſt out the ancient Inhabitants, ſeating themſelues in their poſſeſſions without any other recompence, ſauing reproachfull termes, calling them their drudges, ſlaues and vaſſals: beſides the Temple there erected in honour of Claudius, was now become an eye-ſore vnto them, as an Altar of their perpetuall ſubiection, while the Auguſtall Prieſts there attending, waſted all their wealth vnder pretext of Religion. But the very ſpring or head, from whence the cauſe of this ſudden Rebellion iſſued, was the preſent abuſe offered to * Boduo, Queene of the Icenians, late wife to Praſutagus, deceaſed, vpon the inſuing occaſion.

(11) Whereupon the Icenians began ſeriouſly to diſcourſe of their preſent miſeries and bondage, made ſubiect not onely to a Lieutenant that ſucked their blood, but likewiſe to a Procurator, that ſought their ſubſtance, while with a ſeruile feare they yeelded to pleaſe the meaneſt Souldier; As though the Heauens had framed them onely for ſeruitude, and the Earth appointed to beare their iniuries vn reuenged, wheras contrariwiſe, they ſaw both heauen and earth flexible to their deliuerance: For (whether by policy or chance) the Image of victory at Camulodunum fell downe reuerſed without any apparant cauſe knowne: the women diſtempered with furie, ranne in the ſtreets, ſinging, and prophecying deſtructions: ſtrange noiſes were heard in the Court, and howlings in the Theater, and ſtrange apparitions and Edifices ſeene in the Riuer Thamiſis: the Ocean it ſelfe betweene Gallia and them ſeemed all bloody, and the prints of dead bodies left in the ſands at the Ebbe. Againe, weighing the preſent eſtate, they ſaw Suetonius abſent, and buſied to enlarge the Confines, the midſt but ſlenderly guarded, and by thoſe who were readier for priuate gaine, then diligent to diſcharge the offices of warre. The examples of other Prouinces alſo whetted the edge of their encouragements: for Germany (they ſaw) had well ſhaken off the yoke of ſubiection: The Parthians had reuolted, and Armenia held play with Corbulo, as famous as Paulinus: Their cauſe was as iuſt, their land as well defended, their anceſtors as valiant in reſiſting the firſt Ring-leader Cæſar; and themſelues better experienced of their aduerſaries powers, and their owne abilliments. So hauing now attained the hardeſt point, which was their aſſembled Conſultations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in acting their intendments) in fine this was reſolued, that liberty was to be preferred, though bought with their liues; and bondage to be auoided, if not otherwiſe, then by their deaths.

So they were ominous ſignes to the Romans, of either part, framed in their owne imaginations, and conſtrued according to their hoped or feared euents. (13) The Queene Boudice chosen Leader.

(13) The Confederates in this businesse were not to seeke their Leader: their Queens dishonours so apparantly knowne, (and for matter of gouernment they made no difference of Sexe) her birth extracted from their Royall blond, her hearts affection approued to her Country, her indignities receiued of the proud Oppressors, & her haughtie spirit threatning reuenge, assured them of her vttermost endeuours: which accordingly shee effected to her dying day, and to her neuer dying fame.

(14) The Romanes likewise prouided themselues, and in the absence of Suetonius, craued aide of Catus Decianus the Procurator, who sent them not aboue two hundred men, and those but badly armed. These ioining with the rest made no great power, all of them relying more to the franchise of the place, then securing themselues with Trench or Bulwark. Being giuen ouer to pleasure, and play, as in the time of a publike peace. Which aduantages by the Enemy were wisely espied, and by Boduo comming on as nobly pursued, when with sword and fire she wasted all in her way, the Temple onely excepted, whereinto part of the Souldiers were fled, but after two daies siege it was battered and taken.

She surpriseth the Romanes.

(15) In this heate of furie, the Britaines proceede, and meeting Petiltus Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, on a hasty March to rescue that which was already lost, they encounter his forces, and slew all his footemen, himselfe with his troope of Horse hardly escaping to his Campe, where in great feare hee entrenched, not daring to attempt any further matter: At notice of these mishaps, Catus like a tall man, tooke his heeles, and sailed into Gallia: by whose cruelty and couetousnes the Britaines were thus inraged to take armes and reuolt, and their entrance thus fortunately proceeding, gaue heart and hope to further successe.

She putteth Petilius Cerealis to flight.

(16) For in this heat of bloud and furie they set vpon, and sacked the free-towne Verolanium, both strong for garrison, and rich in Inhabitants: which Citie (as also Camulodunum had) felt the rage of their mercilesse hands, from whence great booties were carried, and no lesse then seuenty thousand Citizens and Confederates slaine. This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillus is accounted one of the most infortunate losses to the Empire, happening vnder Nero, and the more ignominious to the Romanes (as Dion obserueth) in that it was performed vnder the command of a woman, neither experienced in the feates of Warre, nor vsing the victory according to the Law of Armes: for not any prisoner taken in regard of ransome was saued, nor intercourse of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the measure of their reuenge could neuer bee sufficiently heaped, or the wrath of their gods satisfied with the bloud of their Enemies.

(17) By this time Suetonius the Lieutenant was returned, and taking a muster of his forces in London (a Citie euen then famous for concourse of Merchants, and of great renowne for prouision of all things necessary) stood yet doubtfull whether he should chuse that place for the Seate of warre, or no. But better aduising, dislodged his Host, and with the fourteenth Legion, the Standerd-bearers of the twelfth, and other aids, from places adioyning, incamped vpon a plaine, enclosed with woods, hauing a narrow entrance, and free from Ambush or enemie at his backe.

(18) The Britaines likewise, inferior neither in number nor courage, trumphed abroad by such troupes and multitudes, as the like hath not beene seene, yea and so fierce of courage, and with such assurance of hope, that they brought their wiues to the place to bee witnesses of their valours. Boduo in her Chariot doing the parts of a most noble Generall droue from troope to troope to see and commend their forwardnesse; and dismounting attended with her two daughters, and two hundred and thirtie thousand resolute Britaines, gat her to a seat made of marish turfes, after the manner of the Romans, apparelled in a loose gowne of changeable colours, wearing a kirtle therundervery thick plected, the tresses of her yellow haire hanging down to the skirts. About her necke shee had a chaine of gold, and in her hand held a light speare, being of personage tall and of a comely, chearefull, and modest countenance, and so a while she stood pausing, in viewing her Army, and beeing regarded with a reuerend silence, at length to this effect shee spake vnto them.

Her deuice at concluding her speech.

(20) And thereupon with great force they assayle their enemies, whiles Suetonius was likewise encouraging his Souldiers to the like resolution. The fourteenth Legion by his direction kept the strait as a sure place of defence, till the Britaines in the fury of their first onset, had spent all their darts, which with good successe they had bestowed: but then failing and wearied in their first cōming on too hotly, the Romans sallied out vpon the plaine the Auxiliaries and Horsemen with long launces making their way, and beating downe all that stood before them. The Britaines vnable to endure or withstand such fierce assaults, were forced to giue back, and at length fought to saue themselues by flight, but were hindred by their owne Waggons placed in the rereward of the Army, which gaue the more impediment to their retrait, in that they were then full of their women who in confidence of the victory came thither to behold the fight; which were among the rest all slaine, without regard of sexe or mercie. This day was famous and comparable in renowne for victory to any other of former times, for therein were slaine of the Britaines to the number of eighty thousand men: And the Land brought vnder an vnrecouerable subiection.

(21) Boduo seeing the ouerthrow of her Army, was notwithstanding vnuanquished in her owne Noble spirit: and scorning to be a spectacle in their Triumphs or a vassall to their willes, after the example of Cleopatra, shee made an end of her miseries and life by poison. And Pœnius Posthumus, Camp-master of the second Legion, seeing the good successe of the fourteenth & twētieth: for that disobeying the Generall (contrary to the discipline of War) he had defraudea himselfe and followers of their parts of glory in that seruice, for very griefe slew himselfe: and for their good seruice there performed, Nero greatly honoured the eleuenth, thirteenth & fourteenth Legions, reposing a most sure trust in their valour and fidelitie, euer afterward.

(22) Suetonius animated with this victory, gathered his Army, and encamped again; purposing to end the residue of the warre, if any resisters should remaine: and at that present were sent him out of Germany two thousand Legionary Souldiers, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, & a thousand Horse, wherby his strength was augmented, & the ninth Legion which had beene much weakened by the rashnes of Petilius, fully supplied: So that bootelesse it was for the poore Britaines to make any further resistance, and such as did, or stood doubtfully affected, were daily put to the sword. But nothing distressed them so much, as did famine, and want of Corne being a people in all ages more giuen to warre then Good husbandry, and rather relying vpon the prouisions of others, than by the plough to prouide for themselues; fierce of nature, and slowly lending care to peace, or their mind to such Arts as either nourish, or are nourished by peace.

(23) In these stirres Iulius Classicianus, sent from Nero to succeede Catus in his office of receipts, an enemie, and at variance with Suetonius, ŷ more to cloud his renown, gaue it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either hostile rancour, or pride of a Conquerour, would intreat the yeelders with all Clemency: And likewise by letters sent to Rome, he signified that no end of warre was to be expected, so long as Suetonius remained Generall; attributing euery aduerse luck to his intollerable pride, and euery prosperous ſucceſſe onely to the good fortunes of Cæſar and State of Rome. Theſe Great mens diſſenſions awaked Nero, fearing leſt the BRITAINES, thereby would be more forward to aduantage, with whom experience had ſhewed there was no dallying; & his former loſſes among them being againe recouered; he thought himſelfe diſcharged and quit from all fatall Calamities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he ſent Polycletus, one of his freed ſeruitors, with Commiſſion to examine the differences, and to interpoſe his Authority to worke a reconciliation; at whoſe greatnes it was alſo thought that the BRITAINES would haue quaked, & come in vnder feete. Which thing fell out otherwiſe: for howſoeuer the Captaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, vnto whom he ſhewed himſelfe both arrogant and terrible, yet the BRITAINS made him but their laughing ſtocke, as being themſelues borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was; much admired that ſuch Commanders and Armies which had atchieued ſo great exploites, could be brought to obey, and yeeld account of their actions to ſo baſe a bondſlaue, as they termed him.

CHAPTER VIII.

Nero the last of the Cæsars.

WIth the death of this Tyrãt ended the progeny of the Cæsars, & the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worths, or els, (and that oftner) by the faction and voyce of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate euer feared to contradict, and whose Colonies in euery Prouince sought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though little be recorded of the British affaires, yet because the Monarchy of this Iland was then and long after inuested in the Imperiall dignity, wee may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Gouernours of this Kingdome. Vpon Neroes declining, diuers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Sophonius) set vp against him, but Galba for his reputed integrity got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it vpon his head before his hand had toucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia hauing proclaimed him Emperour, and himselfe in Arragon not free from Neroes hatred, hee sought rather to hazard his life with the glory of a Crowne, then depend vpon his mercy, who had sent secretly the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunall, the more to impresse a fresh remembrãce of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might prouoke a deeperedge of hatred; & his Army about him ready for mutation, these, or the like words he spake.

"(2) My fellow-Souldiers and friends, we "at this time are assembled, to bestow "that vpon others, which we our selues "haue smally enioyed. I meane, liberty "from bondage, & freedome from feares "of a Tyrant. The life that I haue hi- "therto ledde, will sufficiently discharge "me from any aspiring conceit, and my "owne Conscience doth witnesse that I "speake not vpon malice or priuate re- "spects: It grieueth mee to say, but it "bootes not to hide, that, which euery "man seeth. Hath euer Bond-man vnder "a cruell master passed a yeere of harder "seruice, then wee haue done fourteene "vnder Nero? what kinde of exaction hath "he not proued, to supply with extortion "that which with shame hee hath spent? "what kinde of cruelty hath he not pra- "ctised? If we would conceale or seeke to "suppresse it, these dumbe stones would "declare them: For behold, he poisoned "his Father and Brother, abused and slew "his owne Mother, murdered his Wife, "his Tutor, and what els soeuer valiant or "vertuous in Senate, in City, in Prouince, "without any difference of Sexe or Age. "I neede not to speake of the sorrowfull "sighes, and bitter teares of so many yong "gentlemen bereft of their fathers, so "many wiues robbed of their husbands, "so many great men depriued of their "Country, all which cry vengeance vp- "on such a Prince: A Prince? nay an In- "cendiary, a Singer, a Fidler, a Stage- "plaier, a Cart-driuer, a Cryer; no Prince, "nay no man, that hath a man to his hus- "band, and a man to his wife; but a mon- "ster of mankinde: And in truth a subiect, "vpon whom, vice hath made her full "experience, and raised her tryumphs "from the base of Cæsars throne. Against "whom, what Vindex in Fraunce hath al- "ready intended, I am sure you doe "know, and I, for my part, am most sorry "to heare. The whole course of my for- "mer life hath beene hitherto remoued "from Ambition in Court, or from ai- "ming too high abroad, & this little that "remaines of my dayes, I could heartily "wish were to be spent in more ease: But "sith I know not by what my misfortune, "some haue imposed vpon me a Part, "which I neuer meant to sustaine, and "least of all at this age, I will not re- "fuse, if you will also approue it, to sa- "crifice this old Carcase of mine for the "wealth of my Country, not as Empe- "rour or Augustus (which sacred names I "adore afarre off, not daring to approch "them) but as ——— And no further heard, was with great acclamations salu-

Glory like a Bubble.

(3) But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it fals againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaues neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed vpon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hasty election: for newes being brought that the State stood firme for Nero, and for certain that Vindex was slaine, euen in his first enterprise of reuolt; that Virginius was sided by his Germane Legions, and his name inscribed in their banners; and that Nymphidius was the man whose deserts could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much ouer-swaied his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clunia in great deiection, repenting himselfe of that which he had done, and wished againe his priuate estate.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly divulged, and Virginius his refusals of the Imperiall Title, gaue strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Army: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though indeede a weake, sickly, and silly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that aray passed the vast mountaines for Rome. With whose entrance, entred the dislike of his person, as one vnfit to support the state of others, that by age and imbecillity was not able to sustaine his owne; and the imperfections of his gouernment caried euery way farre vnder expectation, daily added their further dislikes; which assaying himselfe to redresse, hee soone shooke the foundation of his owne fabricke: for in a blunt and short oration by him made vnto the Senate and Souldiers, he declared Piso Licinianus his Cæsar; ioyning him in present power with himselfe, and after his decease, his successor in the Empire.

Tacit. hist. 1. * Suluius. Saluius Otho conspireth Galbaes death.

(5) Whereat howsoeuer others stood affected, yet Marcus * Saluius Otho (one, who for commerce in lewdnes was very deare to Nero, & whose hope depended vpon the common disturbance, for that his excesse in riot had now brought him to the brinke of beggery) much enuied thereat; the rather because himselfe had entertained a hope that Galba would haue adopted him; but therein deceiued, as his concurrent set his own aspiring mind for the Crowne. And euen now this time best fitted his attempts, being the wane of Galbaes authority, & before the full of Pisoes power; his Astrologers and star-gazers forwarding him with their vaine predictions; a kinde of people euer to Princes vnfaithfull, to hopers deceitfull, and in a common wealth alwayes forbidden, yet alwayes retained. And Otho preuailing with the Pretorian souldiers, by great gifts, and faire promises, practised, and wrought (within eight dayes following) Galbaes death: which his treason hee so cunningly carried, that still hee accompanied the Emperour with great obseruances, as his priuate, & especiall friend. But the conspiracy ripened ready for the blanche, Otho stole secretly from the Palace, vnto the Pretorian Cohorts, purposely so appointed: where no sooner come and seen, but they saluted him Emperour, and vpon their shoulders bare him towards their Campe. The rumor arising of this suddain reuolt sore affrighted Galba, thē ready to do sacrifice vnto his gods, and so distracted his followers, that there were as many aduices as there were men, & messengers posting from Campe vnto Court, brought as diuers relations, as their own suspitions conceiued: in which distraction, the weake and wauering old man was so wrapped, that besides throngings from place to place, nothing was effected, till lastly abandoned by his owne followers, a troupe of horse-men sent from the Campe tumultuously slew him and presented his head vpon the point of a lance to Otho. With him died Piso his elected Cæsar, whom Sulpitius Florus one of the British Cohorts slew, and Titus Iunius a Consull, with others that had beene deere vnto Galba whilst he was Emperour.

Astrologers & Starre-gazers.

(6) He was of a good stature; his head bald, his eyes gray, and his nose hooked, his hands and feet crooked, by reason of the gout, and a bunch of flesh or wen vpō his right side. A great feeder and Sodomite he was, seuere in iustice, and ouer-ruled by his seruants. He died aged seuenty three yeeres, hauing out-liued fiue Princes. In prosperity happier vnder the Empire of others, then in his owne; for hee sate only seuen moneths, and them with small content. In his flourishing age with great renowne hee had serued in Germany: Africke he ruled as Proconsul, and the neerer Spaine vprightly and well; seeming more then a priuate man whilest he was priuate, and held capable of the Empire, had he neuer beene Emperour.

THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAINE.

CHAPTER IX.

THis ſhort time of Galbaes gouernment, with the conſpiracies againſt his Predeceſſors, admitteth ſmall remembrances of our Britiſh affaires: which Prouince (ſayth Tacitus) among all other ſtirres againſt both Nero and Galba, held amity, and ſtood in quiet; whether it was the farre diſtance of place, ſeuered by Sea from the ſeditions of the Reuolters; or that by continuall ſeruice againſt the Enemy the malice of their humours were ſpent, it is vncertaine. Therefore a while to digreſſe from the Succeſſion of our Britiſh Monarchs, and to fill vp the emptineſſe of thoſe Times with matters incident to our ſelues, let it not ſeeme either tedious or ſuperfluous, to ſpeake of the planting of his Kingdome in this Iland, whoſe Rule in ſhort time extended to the Ends of the Earth; and whoſe Ambaſſadour (as ſome haue written) about the midſt of Neroes raigne, and in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixty three, approched for the Inhabitants ſaluation, Aruigarus then ſwaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

(2) At which time (ſay they) were ſent certaine Diſciples out of France into Britaine by Philip the Apoſtle, whereof Ioſeph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Chriſt, was chiefe; who firſt laid the foundation of our faith in the Weſt parts of this Iland, at the place then called Aualon, (afterwards Inis Witrin, now Glaſtenbury) where with twelue Diſciples of his Aſſiſtants preached the Goſpell of life vnto the Ilanders, and there left their bodies to remaine for a ioyfull reſurrection. And the foreſaid Dorotheus, as alſo Mirmanus, nameth Ariſtobulus one of the ſeuenty Diſciples (the ſame whom Saint Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans among others ſaluteth) to haue taught the doctrine of Saluation, and to haue executed the office of a Biſhop here in Britaine,

(5) But yet there are others, who vpon a very good ground, from the words of Gildas

Gildas de Conqueſt. Brit.

Gildas (the most ancient of our British Historians) will haue the Sunne of the Gospel long before to haue risen in this our West; and this Iland of Britaine to haue enioyed the very morning of his Ascent, the brightnesse thereof piercing thorow the mistie clouds of errour, shined here in Britaine euen in the daies of Tiberius, towards whose end Christ suffered his death Which assertion the sayd Gildas doth not deliuer coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, and relying vpon good grounds, as it appeareth when hee sayth, Scimus, &c. Wee know for certainty, that this was in the latter time of Tiberius. Which was immediately after our blessed Sauiours Passion.

S Peter the Apostle supposed to haue preached in Britaine. Act. 15.7.

To which vncontroleable testimony some others haue added (though not perhaps on so vndoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apostle preached the word of life in this Iland, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had chosen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Gospell and beleeue, (as himselfe alledgeth) and that hee here founded Churches and ordained Priests & Deacons, which is reported by Simon Metaphrastes out of the Greeke Antiquities, & Guilielmus Eisingrenius in the first of his Century, who saith that Peter was here in Neroes time; whereas Baronius thinketh that it was in the reigne of Claudius, when the Iewes were banished Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epistle to the Romanes mentioneth him not. Indeed Baronius and some others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching here; but I see not well how it can stand either with Eusebius his account, which keepes him so long at Rome after he was Bishop there, or with Onuphrius, who denieth that he went west-ward (being expulsed by Claudius) but to Ierusalem and thence to Antioch, where hee liued till the death of Claudius: whence it must follow, that if Peter were here at all, it was before euer he went to Rome, and that the Gospell was preached here before it was in Rome, if Peter were the first (as some hold) that preached there: both which may bee the more probable, if we consider the huge multitudes of Christians (fifteene thousand, sayth Baronius) which dispersed themselues into al parts of the world vpon the martyring of S. Steuen at Ierusalem, (which was presently vpon the death of Christ) and that Ioseph of Arimathea was one of that number, Baronius doth confesse. I am here contented to steppe ouer that Monkish tale reported by Aluredus Rivallensis (the writer of King Edward the Confessors life) that a holy man (forsooth) studious and carefull for a Gouernour to succeed, was in his sleepe told by S. Peter, that the kingdome of England was his, wherein himselfe had first preached, and would also prouide him Successors. For seeing it was a dreame, for a dreame we leaue it; and Peter among the other elders to attend his Throne, that now sitteth in glorious Maiesty, and who in his life minded no such earthly preheminence, no not to diuide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

Luk. 12.13.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apostle of the Circumcision, and therefore more likly to haue spent his endeuours on them: but for Paul (the Doctor of the Gentiles) his arriuall here may seeme more warrantable, who doubtlesse (after his first releasement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Christ to these westerne parts of the world, & among them, as may appeare, to this Iland of Britaine, as both Sophronius Partriarke of Ierusalem and Theodoret an ancient Doctor of the Church, doe affirme and approue, saying that Fishers, Publicans, and the Tent-Maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Euangelicall light vnto all Nations, reuealed the same vnto the Britaines. That Paul came into Illyricum, Gallia, and Spain, & filled all those parts with his doctrine, both Eusebius, Dorotheus, and Epiphanius doe testifie: and of this generall Ambassage the Apostle himselfe saith, that the sound of the Gospell went thorow the earth, and was heard vnto the ends of the world: which his sayings cannot more fitly bee applied to any other Nation then vnto vs of Britaine, whose land by the Almighty is so placed in the terrestriall globe, that thereby it is termed of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be situated in another world; for so in an Oratiō that Agrippa made to the Iewes and Agricola to his Romanes, it is called: which made Solinus write that the coast of France had beene the End of the Earth, had it not beene for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion we reade, that the old Souldiers of Gallia whom Claudius commanded for Britaine, complained that they must bee inforced to make warre out of the world. And of this Land and latter Apostle (if credit may be giuen to a Poet) Venantius Fortunatus thus recordeth:

(7) Thus for Paul, well knowne in Rome by his long imprisonments, and (at that time) in reuerend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom also there were some Britaines that embraced the faith, whereof Claudia Rufina (remembred by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extols:

Martial. lib. 2. Epig. 54.

Claudia caruleis cùm sit Rufina Britannis,
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus formæ! Romanam credere matres
Italides possunt, Atthides esse suam.
How hath Dame Claudia, borne of Britains blew,
Won fame for wisdome with our sages graue?
Her comely forme and learning as her due.
Rome claims for hers, & hers would Athens haue.

Matth. Park. Archb. in Anti. Eccl. Britan. Bale, &c.

This Claudia is by the learned cõmended to haue beene most skilfull in the Greeke and Latine tongues; of whom heare them (not me) speake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (say they from Tacitus) many Noble Britains were brought to Rome, who there remaining their Confederates, they held it an honour to haue their children named after the Nobilitie of the Romans: and from Claudius Cæsar was this Ladie Claudia named, who according to her worth was matched in marriage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronell, after a Senator, a man of milde disposition, naturally modest, a great Philosopher in the Sect of the Stoickes, for his sweetnesse of behauiour called Pudens, who by his graue perswasions caused Martial (the wittie but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings; and by him is cõmended for his humanity, piety, learning, and eloquence: as also his wife Claudia the Britaine, for her beauty, faith, fruitfulnesse, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Bale hath mentioned three seuerall Treatises, besides others by her compiled both in the Greeke and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens to be one of the seuentie two, & Volaterranus affirmeth them both Paules disciples, from whom he sendeth greeting to Timotheus in these words: Eubulus and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, & all the brethren salute thee. But some may obiect, that Martials Claudia could not be that Lady, who liuing in Neroes time gaue hospitalitie vnto Peter & Paul at their being in Rome, for that shee could not retaine such beauty and perfection as the Poet to her doth ascribe in the reigne of Domitian, the seuenth in succession from Nero, the time being too long (saith Ado, Bishop of Treuers, Vsuardus and others) for beauty to be so freshly preserued. But howsoeuer these account her age then to be sixty, yet if we reckon according to Eusebius, we shall see that he sets the last of Claudius in the yeare of grace fifty sixe, and the first of Domitian in eighty three, betwixt which, are but twenty seauen yeeres, and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nero, and in his thirteenth yeare, from the prison wrote his Epistle to Timothy, as the same Eusebius declareth: so that from hence vnto Domitian, is left but fourteene yeeres, a time no whit vnpossible to retaine Beauty, though twenty yeeres and many moe of her age had beene formerly spent; seeing that in those times Plutarch praiseth Alcibiades to be passingly faire when he was threescore yeares of age.

Euseb. Eccle. hist. li. 2. c. 22.

Alcibiades his beauty in old age.

This Claudia then with Pauls spirituall Manna, is said to send likewise the choisest and chastest of the Poesies of Martial for new-yeares gifts vnto her friends in Britaine, both for to feede their Soules with the bread of life, and to instruct their mindes with lessons best fitting vnto ciuill behauiour; which thing moued the Poet himselfe with no small selfe-glory in his verse thus to write:

Claudia sends both Paules & Martialls writings into Britaine.

Martial. lib. 7. Epig. 10.

Dicitur & nostros cantare Britannia versus:
And Britaine now (they say) our verses learne to sing.

(8) It hath also passed with allowance among the learned Senate of our Antiquaries; that when Claudius and Nero began to banish & persecute the Christians in Rome, (whose superstitions, as Tacitus pleaseth to tearme them, from Iudea had infected the City it selfe) many Romans & Britaines being conuerted to the Faith, fled thence vnto these remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enioy the liberty of their Professions, vntill the search of Tyrants by the flame-light of Persecutions had found out all secret places for the safeties and assemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the dayes of Diocletian we shall find: And from this Sanctuary of Saluation, the sad lamenting Lady * Pomponia Græcina, the wife of Aulus Plautius (the first Lord Lieutenant of Britaine) brought that Religion, whereof shee was accused and stood indited vpon life and death, which was none none other, then the Christian Profession, seeing the same both by Tacitus and Suetonius, is euerie where termed the strange superstitions and new kinde of Sect that the Christians imbraced, and for which they were accounted vnworthy to liue.

Tacitus annal. lib. 13.7. & lib. 15.10. Suetonius in vita Nero. Sect. 16.

(9) And much about these times, (as Beatus Rhenanus in his History of Germany, Pantaleon and others doe report) one Suetonius a Noble mans sonne in Britain conuerted to the Faith by the first Planters of the Gospell in this Iland, and after his Baptisme called Beatus, was sent by the Brethren from hence vnto Rome, to be better instructed, and further directed by Saint Peter himselfe; and returning through Switzerland, found such willingnesse and flocking of the people to heare and receiue the Doctrine of Christ, that he there staid and built an Oratorie, not farre from the lake Thun, and neare the Towne called Vndersewen, where in preaching and prayers he imployed his time to the day of his death, which happened in the yeare of grace 110.

B Rhenan. in his Hist. of Germany. Pantaleon.

And that there were Christians in Britain at these times I make no question, though some exceptions may be take against the Monke of Burton the reporter thereof, who sayth in the 141 yeere, and raigne of Hadrian, nine masters of Grantcester were baptized themselues, & preached to others the Gospell in Britain; howsoeuer he faileth in the Emperours name; which yeare was the second of Antoninus Pius his successor, and ascribeth to these men Schoole-degrees, altogether vnknowne for nine hundred yeares after, yet these doe not hinder the truth of the thing, though that Monke was none of the best Historians. It is reported also that Patrick the Irish Apostle, and Canonized Saint, long before the raigne of King Ethelbert preached the Gospell in many places of Wales: As also that Ninianus Bernicius of the race of the British Princes conuerted the Picts to the Religion of Christ. Vnto these aforesaid authorities and testimonies howsoeuer we stand affected: yet it is certaine by Chemnitius citing Sabellicus, that the Britaines were with the first Conuerts: And Tertullian who liued within two hundred yeers of Christs Nativity, sheweth no lesse: Who the more to prouoke the Iewes against whom he wrote, calleth to witnesse the fruitfull increase of the Gospell of salvation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Britaines to haue receiued the Word of life, the power whereof (saith he) hath pierced into those parts whither the Romanes could not come. Whence Petrus Cluniacensis supposeth the Scottish men the more ancient Christians, as not being in the like subiection to the Romans, as other then were.

(10) Origen, who flourished not much aboue two hundred yeares after Christ, in his Homilies vpon Ezechiel sheweth, that the first fruits of Gods harueste was gathered in the Iland of Britaine: who consented to the Christian faith by the doctrine of their Druides: that taught one onely God: with whom Hector Boetius agreeth saying, that some of these Druides condemned the worship of God in Images, and allowed not the application of the Godhead vnto any visible forme: which might be the cause why Claudius the Emperour forbad their Religion, as fauouring in these things too much of Christianity; whom likewise he banished Rome, as some from Suetonius coniecture. Of these Druides we shewed before, that their offices were most imploied about holy things, and that their doctrine chiefly consisted in teaching the immortality of the soule, the motions of the heauens, the nature of things, and the power of the Gods: yea and Postellus from others will inforce, that they prophecied likewise of a Virgins conception. These were the helps, sayth Tertullian, that caused the Britaines so soone to imbrace the Doctrine of Christ, and thereupon immediatly after his death doth Gyldas fasten our conuersion, where he writeth, That the Glorious Gospell of Iesus Christ, which first appeared to the late world in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, did euen then spread his bright beames vpon this frosen Iland of Britaine.

then, whom God his Father had giuen to be his. So fruitfull and famous was this ſpreading of the Goſpell, that Baptiſta Mantuan, a Chriſtian Poet, compares the increaſe thereof with that of Noah, thus alluding vnto it:

Baptiſ. Mant.

Sicut aquis quondam Noe ſua miſit in orbem
Pignora ſedatis; vt Gens humana per omnes
Debita cœlitum Patri daret orgia terras:
Sic ſua cum vellet Deus alta in regna reuerti,

Sint oranda, quibus Cœlum placabile Sacris.

In Engliſh thus:

As Noah ſent from the Arke his ſonnes, to teach
The Lawes of God vnto the World aright:
So Chriſt his Seruants ſent abroad to preach
The Word of life, and Goſpell to each wight:
No place lay ſhadowed from that glorious Light,
The farthеſt Iles, and Earths remoteſt bounds,
Embrac'd their Faith, & ioi'd at their ſweet ſounds.

(12) To which effect alſo the ſayings of S. Iohn Chryſoſtome, Biſhop of Conſtantinople doe enforce, who ſhewing the increaſe of Chriſtianity, and the ſucceſſe of the Goſpell preached, ſheweth the power thereof to haue extended, not only to the Countries farre iacent in the continent, but alſo to the Ilands ſituated in the Ocean it ſelfe, and amongſt them expreſly nameth this our Britaine; whoſe Inhabitants (ſaith hee) haue alſo conſented to the Word which is planted in euery heart, in honour whereof they haue erected their Temples and Altars. And againe thoſe Britaines (ſayth hee) which had formerly fed vpon humane fleſh, making no difference betwixt the bloud of man and beaſts, now through the power of the word by them embraced, haue learned the law of true piety, and giue themſelues to a religious abſtinence, and holy faſts. Of which Barbariſme S. Ierome alſo complained, that ſome of thoſe Nations vſed to eat the buttocks of boyes, & Paps of Virgins, which in their Feaſts were ſerued for the daintieſt diſhes. But elſ-wher ſpeaking of the Britaines cõuerſiõ, he ſaith, that they had turned themſelues from their Weſterne Paganiſme, and now had directed their faces towards Ieruſalem in the Eaſt, whoſe beauty ſhined in the word of God.

(13) And thus we ſee by the planting of the Goſpel in this Ilãd, the ſaying of the Pſalmiſt accompliſhed, that God would giue his ſonne Chriſt the Heathen for his inheritance, and the Ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Britaine) to be his poſſeſſion. And the ſucceſſe in Hiſtory moſt apparently ſheweth theſe parts (by an eſpeciall prerogatiue) to be Chriſts Kingdome. For albeit that Ieruſalem & Antioch may rightly claime the precedency of all other places, the one being as it were the chamber where Chriſtians were firſt borne, and the other the font where they were firſt Chriſtened with that moſt ſacred name: yet Britaine in ſome other graces hath outſtript them all, hauing the glory to bee graced with the firſt Chriſtian King that euer raigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, ỹ firſt fruits of all the Kings that euer laid their crownes at the foote of our Sauiours Croſſe: as alſo for producing the firſt Chriſtian Emperour, that by publike authority eſtabliſhed the Goſpell through the world, which was Conſtantine the Great, borne & brought vp here in Britaine by Queene Helena, a moſt vertuous and religious Britiſh Lady: vnto whoſe daies the ſucceſſion of Chriſtianity did here continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints vnder Diocleſian is apparant. Herein alſo raigned the King that firſt vncrowned the head of that vſurping Roman Beaſt, and freed the land from his deuouring Locuſts: putting downe Idolatry with Hezekiah that brake the braſen Serpent: & with Iſaack new digged the Wels that thoſe Philiſtines had ſtopped: And laſtly hath this Iland produced that moſt royall and Chriſtian Monarke whoſe learned pen hath firſt depainted Antichriſt, and pierced the heart of all Papall ſupremacy, as the ſword of Gedeon did Zalmunna (* the Image of trouble) King of Madian. And as a Lion hath he met that crooked [a] Serpent in the way of his vſurped authority; whereby in ſhort time vndoubtedly the [b] Kall of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewiſe by his moſt godly example, caſt off the yoke of vaſſallage, and in their ſeuerall Dominions gouerne (as free Princes ought) the people that GOD hath cõmitted to their charge. So that in thoſe and many other the like Princes of this happy Iland, moſt properly is performed that propheticall promiſe made vnto the Church of Chriſt, that Kings ſhould become her nurſing Fathers, and Queenes ſhould be her nurſing Mothers. Of both which may be truly ſaid to Britaine, in imitation of that of Salomon; Many kingdomes haue done glorioufly, but thou haſt ſurmounted them all.

(17) The Danes likewiſe, their Conquerours, and Succeſſors in this Royall Throne, euer vntill then were both bloudy and barbarous, and therefore of all our Writers commonly called the Pagan Danes, whoſe many deſolations and ruines remaine as records of their cruelties in many places euen vnto this day: yet being a while in this Land, King Guthurn, with thirtie of his chiefe Princes and people were drawn by the valour & vertue of King Alured to receiue the Chriſtian Faith, by whoſe bounty thereupon they enioyed the poſſeſſion of a faire portion of this Kingdome. And afterward Canutus, their greateſt King, no ſooner almoſt had this Imperiall Diademe ſet vpon his head, but that hee held it his chiefe Maieſty to bee the vaſſall of Chriſt, confeſſing him only to be King of Kings, and with ſuch religious deuotion as then was taught, crowned the Crucifix at Wincheſter with the Crowne hee wore: and neuer after thorow all his raigne, by any meanes would weare the ſame: and the Danes his Souldiers remaining in England, began by little & little to embrace Chriſtianity and in ſhort time were all conuerted to the Faith. Thus then we ſee the happie increaſe of theſe holy ſeedes ſpringing from the furrowes of this bleſſed groũd: & the Tents of Sem to be ſpread vpon the Mountaines of Britaine, wherein God (according to his promiſe) perſwaded vs who are of Iapheth, to dwell.

19 For, all this time (ſaith the ſaid Dicetus) Chriſtian Religiõ flouriſhed quietly in Britanny, till Diocleſians time, their Churches were demoliſhed, their holy Bibles caſt into Bone-fires, & the Prieſts with their faithfull flocke bloudily murdered. In which number about the yeare two hundred ninety three, as we reade in (Beda, Malmeſbury, Randulphus, and others) Albane with his teacher Amphibalus, were both of them martyred for the profeſſion of the Goſpell at the old Town Verolanium: as alſo in Leiceſter, thoſe two Noble Citizens, Aaron, and Iulius, with multitudes both of men & women in ſundry places (ſaith Beda) as ſhortly after no leſſe then a Thouſãd Saints ſuffered death at Liechfield, wherupõ the place was called another Golgotha, or field of bloud: In memory whereof, the City beareth for Armes to this day, in an Eſchucheon of Landskip ſundry perſons diuerſly Martyred. And yet after theſe times alſo the Britaines continued conſtant in Chriſtianity, and the cenſures of their Biſhops (for the great eſtimation of their Conſtancy, piety, and learning) required, & approued in great points of Doctrine among the aſſemblies of ſome Generall Counſels; as that of Sardis and Nice, in the time of great Conſtantine (the firſt Chriſtian Emperour, and this our Country-man, whoſe bleſſed dayes gaue free way to that Profeſſion, to the Councels Authority, and to the whole world Peace) had we our Biſhops preſent; whoſe forwardneſſe againſt the Arrian Hereſie, afterward Athanaſius aduanceth in his Apology vnto Iouinian the Emperor, among three hundred Biſhops aſſembled at the Councell of Sardice, in Anno three hundred and fiftie: whoſe words (as Nicephorus reports them) are theſe. Know moſt Chriſtian Emperour (ſaith he) that this faith hath beene alwayes preached and profeſſed, and that all Churches of Spaine, Britaine, France and Germany, at this day with one voyce doe approue the ſame. As alſo at that of Ariminum, in the yeare three hundred fiftie nine, & in the raigne of Conſtantius, who cauſed foure hundred weſterne Biſhops to be there ſummoned in fauour of the Arrians, whereof three were out of Britaine, (as Sulpitius Seuerus the good Biſhop of Burges hath reported) that gaue their ſuffrages againſt that Hereſie. Theſe doth Hilary tearme the Biſhops of the Prouinces of Britaine, by whom they were ſomewhat derided, becauſe beeing farre from their owne Country they liued vpon the Emperours charge. And Beda teſtifieth, that from Diocleſians time they both reedified their former Temples, & founded new alſo in memory of their then freſh-bleeding Martyrs, and enioyed a generall and ioifull peace in their religious profeſſion, till that Arrian Hereſie hauing firſt filled the Continent, ſought and found paſſage ouer the Seas into our Iland.

About the yeere foure hundred seuenty, was a Prouinciall Councell held in Britain, for the reforming of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan mariage of Vortiger had decaied, to the great griefe and discontent of the people, a pregnant signe of the continuing zeale, which vnto those dayes had left a glorious memory.

Arthurs Ensigne. Vincentius in his speculo Historiali.

(21) And the ensigne of Arthur, wherein the Virgin Mary with her sonne in her armes (as is noted by Vincentius) was portraied, so often displaied for Christ, and his Countries liberty against the Pagan Saxons, is a seale to confirme vs of their Profession, and doth shew the badge of that age Christianity. But the famous Monasterie of Bangor, as a Colledge of diuine Philosophers, and by Clariuallensis truly acknowledged to be the Mother of all other in the world, and her Monkes distributed into seuen seuerall parts, euery part numbring three hundred soules, and earning their bread by their daily labours, doth notably witnesse to all succeeding ages, that Christian religion was then both planted and preached in this Iland. And in the Synod held at Austins Oake were seuen old Britaine Bishops, besides other Doctours, who met with that Roman Legate; and not in points of doctrine, but rather in their seuerall rites & ceremonies did varie, by any thing that in that Assembly appeared. For as it is most vndoubted, that (if we speake properly) Ierusalem is the Mother of vs all, and of all Churches; and our former allegations doe euince, that the first Plantation of the British Faith was altogether by Iewes and others of the Easterne Church: so the very rites of this Religious Colledge of Bangor doe euidently proue, that their first institution in Religion came from the East, Beda shewing that in all of them they dissented from the Romane Church; yea, and that they neuer did nor then would acknowledge any authority of the Bishop of Rome ouer them in matters of the Church and seruice of God. All which accordeth rightwell with that before cited out of Zachary, that the waters of life should issue from Ierusalem. And that S. Hierome spake most properly, in saying, the Britaines leauing Paganisme, had turned their faces to Ierusalē in the East.

The foundation of the said Colledge is ascribed to King Lucius, from whose time vnto the entrance of this Austen the Monke, foure hundred thirty eight yeeres were expired: in which space we haue seene that the Christian Faith was both taught and embraced in this land, notwithstanding the continuall persecutions of the Romans, Huns, Picts, and Saxons: which last made such desolations in the outward face of the Church, that they droue the Christiā Bishops into the deserts of Cornwall and Wales. In which number were Theonis and Thadioceus Bishops of London & Yorke, chusing rather to suffer aduersity with the people of God, then to enioy the pleasures of sinne for a season.

(22) To conclude this digreſſion, grown much greater then was intended, we ſee it is moſt apparant, that the Britaines had a ſetled opinion in Chriſtianity before the ſound thereof was heard from Rome; and that the Lord had here ſet vp his ſtandard, whereunto theſe Ilanders reſorted as to the Tower of their ſtrength, and was the firſt Kingdome of the Gentiles that are ſaid to bring their ſonnes thus in their armes, and their daughters thus vpon their ſhoulders, vnto the Lords Sanctuary: whoſe knowledge continually increaſing, hath hitherto, to Englands great ioy and fame, beene ſtill continued, though the ſpirituall ſparkes thereof for a ſeaſon haue ſometimes beene couered in the cinders of the Pagans deſolations, or with the ſuperſtitious worſhips of mans inuentions; both which now diſperſed as clouds before the Sunne, the light appeareth in his full ſtrength, and the moſt pure waters of the word run vntroubled. OTHO.

CHAPTER X.

An. Do. 70

BVt leauing CHRISTS proceedings to the dispose of himselfe, let vs returne to the Subiect from whence we haue wandred, and continue the successions of Great BRITAINES MONARCHES, vnto them that haue held it, whether by chance of Warre, or voice of Election: In which sort (as is said) Galba got it, and but a short time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a shorter time enioyed it.

Otho his originall. Tacit. hist. 2. cap 17.

(2) Whose Originall (saith Tacitus) was from Ferrentium, his Father a Consul, his mothers bloud somewhat disparaged, but yet not base; his youth run ouer with voluptuous wantonnesse and prodigall expences, more ready for disturbances, then depending vpon preferment or dignity of State; and hauing gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the hearty affections of the Souldiers, which Galba had vtterly alienated. Neither did Otho himselfe bandy against Galba, but Vitellius in Germany, was fauoured against both; Two persons so vile & ambitious, as was much feared, would proue the scourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much fauoured.

(3) Vnto Vitellius sided the Britaines, vnder the Conduct of Trebellius Maximus, (remembred before) a man vnfit for warre, & vnexperienced of seruice, compounded altogether of couetousnesse, and for his niggardly sparings, and vnmercifull pollings, exceedingly hated of his Army, which was further aggrauated by Roscius Celius, Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, his ancient Enemy, betwixt whom the sparkes of enuy shortly burst forth into flames of reciprocall accusations. Trebellius being charged of insufficiency for commaund, with the beggering of the Prouince, and Legions; and hee againe accusing Celius of factious behauiours, & dissoluing of discipline: through which dissensions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themselues arrogantly, euen against both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In these stirs Maximus finding himselfe vnable to withstand Roscius, (the commō affection swaying on his side,) with his friends and followers entred Germany in the quarrell of Vitellius, and ioined those British forces to maintain his cause, who now presuming vpon his owne strength, and others his Confederates, ambitiously played the Prince, growne to that height euen of nothing.

In Chap. 7. sect. 24.

Roscius Celius and Trebellius accuse each other.

The Souldiers thereby disordered.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing only cōmendable) sought by all meanes to stay the effusion of more ciuill bloud; and that already spent, so possest his thoughts, that his minde was still distracted and nightly affrighted with the seeming appearance of Galbaes ghost: for which causes he sent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equall part in the Empire, & to giue him also his daughter in mariage. But Vitellius disdaining any competitiō, refuseth all Capitulations, and prepares himselfe for the warre. Otho thus constrained, sets forth his forces, and in three seueralls kirmishes had the victory, but in the fourth at Brixellum lost the day; yet not so much weakened or vnrecouerable, (his Army in number and courage surmounting the other) as himselfe was vnwilling to try the chance of warre any more; for being importunated by his Captaines and Leaders, to reenforce the Battaile, with many reasons, and probabilities of an assured victory, in a thankfull and short Oration, answered thus their Petitions.

Otho affrighted in the night.

I blame not the Gods, nor "enuy your Emperours rising glory: It is "sufficient that my house hath touched "the highest straine of Honour, and my "selfe to be left in records, The soueraigne "Monarch of the World.

(6) And thereupon solemnely taking his leaue of the whole Army, went to his Tent, and with his dagger wounded himselfe vnder the left pappe, whereof immediately hee died, in the yeare of his age thirty seuen, and dayes of his raigne ninety fiue. He was of stature but lowe, feeble in his feete, and vnto so great a minde, his body not any wayes proportionable; his face without haire and womanlike, his attire nice & delicate, & his life & death nothing at al cõsonant or agreeable.

VITELLIVS.

CHAPTER XI.

An. Do. 70.

WHen certaine newes of Othoes death was brought Vitellius, hee presently assumed the name of Cæsar, & administred the affairs of the Empire, with no lesse authority thẽ the absolute cõmander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherwith it was done, vnto Mars in his Temple at Coleyn, as ỹ lucky instrumẽt of his aduanced Estate.

Vitellius glad of Othoes death.

Suetõ in vita Vitell cap. 10. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 8.

(2) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the same the more inhaunced by his strengths of the German Souldiers, & the flatteries of the Senate, which euer bare saile with the faireſt winde. His entrance into Rome was aboue measure magnifical, hauing the naked sword of Iulius Cæsar borne before him, with sound of Trumpets, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Army worthy of a better Prince then Vitellius was.

Vitellius magnificall aboue measure.

(3) His originall is diuersly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of deprauing backe-biters; and both in extreames, extremly disagreeing. For Q. Eulogius. as Suetonius writeth, deduced his descent from Faunus King of Aborigines, & Lady Vitellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a goddesse. But Cassius Seuerus affirmeth him to be sprung from no better roote then a Cobler, & a common naughty-packe the daughter of a Baker. Howsoeuer, true it is, that Lucius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Prouost of Syria, & in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Britaine, he had the whole charge of the Empire committed vnto him: himselfe in speciall fauour with Tiberius, & in vse for his strumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius, for his dice-playing: & with Nero, for his flattery: vnto whose Ghost in publike shew he sacrificed, & disposed the Emperiall affaires at the discretion of base Stage-players.

His descent diuersly reported.

(4) His vnmeasurable gluttony was such, that the whole imploiments of his Captaines were to prouide him Cates, & that in such excesse, that two thousand dishes of fish, and seuen thousand of fowle, were serued to his Table at one supper; and yet was he not ashamed to cõmend his owne Temperance, in a set Oration before the Senate and People, who well knew him to bee guiltlesse of that vertue: insomuch that Tacitus reporteth, in those few moneths wherein hee raigned, hee had wasted nine hundred millions of sesterces, which amounteth to seuen millions, thirty one thousand, two hundred fiftie pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had lived longer, the whole reuenues of the Empire had not beene sufficient to maintaine his gluttony. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in surfet, and farre vnmeet to weild weighty affaires.

(6) The firſt that did reuolt were the Illyrian Bands: to ſuppreſſe which Vitellius ſent vnto Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant of Britaine, for aid of that Prouince, hauing had good experience of their ſeruice in his warres before: As when Hordeonius Flaccus brought eight thouſand Britains to his quarrel againſt Otho: As alſo when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) ioined them to the German forces. Which laſt man had now again reſumed his former place in Britannie, without either Maieſty or Authority, but rather ruled by way of intreatie, and at the diſcretion of the Souldiers.

(7) Vnto whom this Vectius Bolanus ſucceeded for Deputy: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperate, and not odious for any crime. His anſwer vnto Vitellius was, that the Country of Britaine ſtood not ſo quiet that he might ſpare any numbers thence, the Souldiers & Confederates hauing their hands full, to hold all vpright. Neither (in truth) were they faſt to his ſide, but rather affected Veſpaſian, whoſe reputation in warlike affaires was firſt gotte amongſt them in Britaine, in the raigne of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus, that the Vexillaries of three Britiſh Legions followed Vitellius in his expedition againſt the Illyrian Army, wherein the flower & ſtrength of all the Britaines are reported to haue been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his aid, in whom not withſtanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily reuolts of the Prouinces, and the approach of Veſpaſian, was minded to reſigne his dignitie vnto him, had not the out-cries of the people beene againſt it.

(8) Finally, when he had raigned only eight moneths, and fiue dayes, as Ioſephus accounteth, he was ſlaine in moſt ignominious manner: for his hands were bound behinde his backe, a halter faſt about his necke, his clothes rent and torne, a ſword-point ſet vnder his chinne, & his head held backward by a buſh of haire, as condemned malefactors were vſed, to the end, that he might ſee and be ſeene of all, to ſatisfie there malice, and augment his miſeries. He died aged fifty ſeuen; and as hee is ſet in the Table after Malmesbury, Huntington, and others our Engliſh writers, the ninth Calends of Ianuary: But yet it ſhould ſeeme by his Edicts ſet out againſt Aſtrologers, that commanded all of that profeſſion to depart out of Rome and Italy before the firſt day of October; that much about that time he ſhould die: for Suetonius recordeth, that the ſaid Aſtrologers ſet another againſt him in the words as follow. CHAPTER XII.

An. Do. 72

SO acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and ſuch hopes reuiued at the entrance of his Succeſſour, as that all mens mindes were raiſed to an expectation, that the glory of the Empire, ſo much Eclipſed through the ciuill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this laſt Vitellius, ſhould now ſhine againe in the beauty of her former liberty by the desired gouernment of aged Vespasian, whose integrity, valour, and seruice, had been sufficiently approued by his many Expeditions, in all the Prouinces wherein he had to doe.

(2) His descent was from the Flauian family, & that but base and obscure: his father called Titus Flauius, his mother Polla Vespasia, his Wife Domilia, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperours succeeding after him.

His imployment in former times. Tacit. in vita Agric fo. 189.

(3) In his yong yeeres, he serued as a Military Tribune in the Country of Thracia, and as Questor in the Prouinces of Crete and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, hee went forth into Germany, as Lieutenant of a Band, & from thence was sent into Britaine, to be Leader of the second Legion, where the foundation of that greatnes whereunto after hee attained, was first laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victory he fought thirty set battailes, and was also Conquerour of the Ile of wight: whereby two mighty Nations were subdued to the Romans; & twentie Townes wonne from the Britaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily assigned him by Claudius, whose owne Triumph, (as Iosephus saith) was gotten without any paines of his, but by the only prowesse of Vespasian. After this, he gouerned Africk with singular integrity and much honour, and was lastly sent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria vpon this occasion.

Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 3. cap. 1.

Suet. in vita Vespa. Sect. 4.

An ancient prophecie in all the East parts.

(4) There had beene spread thorow all the East parts an old prophesie & setled opinion constantly beleeued, that it was appointed by the Destinies, there should come out of Iury him that should be the Lord of the whole world: which how it serued for the Iewes to reuolt, or for the Romanes to apply onely vnto Vespasian, the euent sheweth, which cannot agree to any other, then to the person and power of Christ Iesus, there borne, and throughout the whole world still raigning; Yet vpon the confidence of such an accomplishment, the Iewes reuolted from the Romans obedience, and slew their President Sabinius by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant Generall of Syria, that came to his aide, & got from him the maine Standard or Ensigne of the Eagle. This Nation was so populous and strong, that none was thought fitter to stay their attempts, then was Vespasian, who with great honour and approbation, reduced that Prouince vnto their former subiection, and there remained the short time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, their raignes: of whose proceedings there * Iosephus writeth at large, vnto whom I must referre the vnsatisfied Reader.

The cause of the Iewes reuolt.

Iosephus de Bello Iud.

(5) All which times, the ciuill stirres amongst the Romans, gaue the Prouinces occasion to attempt their former liberties; as did the Batauians, Germans, and French, with whom the Britaines also tooke heart to reuolt: But the first that sided with Vespasian, were two thousand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Mesian Legions, and sent to aide Otho against Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the aduantage of the offered opportunity; with an vncontrolled liberty, committed many robberies and outragious villanies: In so much, that fearing condigne punishment, they held it their best pollicy, to combine some speciall man by their fauours vnto them, whereby their facts might bee either quite smoothered, or lightly repreheaded: neither in their opiniō was any so gracious for desert or power, as was Vespasian, and therefore with one assent they proclaimed him Emperour, & wrote his name in their Banners, thinking themselues as worthy to make an Emperour, as was the Legions either of Spaine or Germany.

Tacit. hist. 3. cap. 9.

Vespasian chosen Emperour by the Mesian Souldiers.

(6) Of the like minde were his owne Legions in Syria and Iury, growne now so famous by the prosecution of those warres, that they highly conceited his valour, and their owne sufficiency to bee inferiour to none: And therefore all on the sudden at Cæsaria, both Captaine and Souldier salute him Emperour; which title when he resolutely gainsaid and refused, with drawne swords they threatned his death. Thus then being brought into danger euery way, he sent his letters vnto Tiberius Alexander, Lieutenant of Ægypt, who likewise at Alexandria, presently proclaimed him Emperour.

By his owne. Ioseph bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 10.

(7) At this time Vectius Bolanus sent by Vitellius was Lieutenant of Britaine, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner then was fit for so fierce a Nation: for the Souldiers hauing gotten head, by the remisse Gouernment of Trebellius Maximus, continued the same looseneſse in discipline still: and Bolanus in stead of awe and Obedience, retained onely their affections and good wils. But most especially the short Raignes of these last Emperours (whose beginnings were altogether imploied ployed to satisfie their licentious pleasures, and latter times spent for the defence of their Lines from violent Deaths) gaue way to many imperfections of the Gouernours, and misdemeanours of the common Souldiers.

Tacit in vita Agric fol. 187.

Petilius Cerealis Deputy in Britaine.

(8) But when Vespasian had assumed the Empire, great Captaines and good Souldiers were sent into the Prouinces, and into Britain, Petilius Cerealis that had formerly there made proofe of his seruice vnder Nero, in the warres against Boduo, and afterwards in other parts, as against the Gaules and Batauians, with prosperous victories. The fame of this man strooke great terror into the hearts of the wauering Britaines, and amongst them of the * Brigantes, the most populous State of the whole Prouince: against whom at his first approach they warred, & in many battels, and some of them bloudy, the greatest part of these people were wasted, and their Country came into the Romish subiectiõ.

Yorkeshire, Lancashire, Westmorland, and the Bishopricke of Durham.

Iulius Frontinus subdueth the Britaines.

(9) Wherby the glory of Cerealis might well haue dimmed the fame of his Successor, had not Iulius Frontinus a great Souldier also sustained the charge with reputation and credit, in subduing the strong and Warlike nation the * Silures: where he had, beside the force of the enemie to struggle with, the straits, and difficult places of rockes and mountaines for accesse.

* South-wales.

Iulius Agricola Lieutenant in Britaine.

(10) After whose gouernment (no further acts being mentioned,) Iulius Agricola, who in Rome had beene Questor, Tribune, and Pretor, and Lieutenant in Aquitania, was sent Generall into Britain by Vespasian the Emperour, the yeere before his death. This man formerly had there serued vnder the command of Petilius Cerealis, whereby he had gained experience both of the People and Prouince; and at his first approach gathered the Ensignes of the Legions, and other aids of the Auxiliaries (who for that yeare attẽded an end of their trauels, because the Summer was almost spent) lest by protracting time, the violence of the Ordouices should further burst forth, who a little before his entrance, had vtterly almost cut off a wing which lay on their Borders, the rest of the Country, as men desirous of Warre, allowing their example.

Against these Agricola addressed, who kept themselues in places of aduantage, and durst not descend into indifferent ground. Hee therefore being himselfe foremost, led vp his Army to their encounter, and seconded with the courage of his trained Souldiers, put them all to sword and flight, whereby the whole nation was almost quite destroyed.

He ouercommeth the Ordouices.

(11) And now that his fame began to ascend, he knew well that with instance it must be followed, and as the first affaires had issue; the rest would succeede: hee therefore deliberated to conquer the Iland Mona, from the possession whereof Paulinus Suetonius was reuoked, by the generall Rebellion vnder Boduo. But in a purpose not purposed before, and ships wanting, the policy of the Captaine deuised a passage: for he commanded the most choice of the Aids, to whom the shallowes were well known, and without whom the Romans did almost attempt no thing) to put ouer at once; and suddenly to inuade them. These Britaines, after the vse of their Country manner, were most Skilfull swimmers, and in swimming armed able to gouerne themselues and horses. The Monaans thinking themselues secure, for that no Ships were seene in their Riuer, now thus suddenly surprized, as men amazed, firmely thought that nothing could be inuincible to them, who came with such resolutions to Warre, and therefore they humbly desired Peace, and yeelded the Iland vnto Agricolaes deuotion.

He winneth the Iland of Mona.

(12) Who now in these prosperous proceedings of his fortunes, sought not with any glorious relations or letters of aduertisements, to improue and augment the greatnesse of his honour; but rather in seeking to suppresse his fame, made it shine more bright; and addressing himselfe for ciuill gouernment, reformed many abuses in his House, his Campe, and in the whole Prouince, and those especially that most touched the poorer sort, as by moderating the increase of Tribute & Corne, wherwith the Britains were daily burdened: by the suppressing of which enormities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was euery where entertained, and a generall inclination vnto Peace, which partly by the negligence, partly by the auarice of former Gouernors, had bin no lesse feared then Warre it selfe.

Agricola good to the poore.

(13) And whereas the Britaines hitherto still harried with Oppressions and Warres, had little leisure or will to apply themselues to things which accompany Peace, and are the ornaments of Ciuill and settled Societies, and therfore were prone vpon euery occasion to reuolt and stirre: to induce them by pleasures to quietnesse and rest, he exhorteth them in priuate uate and helpt them in publike, to build Temples, Houses, and Places of Assemblies, and common resort; and likewise prouided that the sonnes of their Nobles should be instructed in the liberall Arts and Sciences, commending the industrie, and preferring the wits of the Britaines before the Students of France, as being now growne curious to attaine the Eloquence of the Romane Gentry, (yea euen the Gowne the habit of peace, and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous Buildings, Banquets and Baths.

The Britains ciuilized.

(14) And thus farre had Agricola proceeded before the death of Vespasian, whose managing of the Imperiall dignitie was euery way answerable to so high a place, and whose death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did surmount his Predecessors. But as touching his miraculous cures of the Blind & the Lame, as they serue not either to be vrged or inserted in this our present History; so yet may they conuince the indurate Atheist, whose conscience is seared with the sinne of incredulitie of the Miracles, wrought by our blessed Sauiour Iesus Christ. For if the wisest Historians of those times haue beleeued themselues, & left Records vpon their credit to following posteritie, that by his touch onely he cured a Lame man, and with his spittle opened the eyes of the Blind, being a mortall & sinfull man; shall it then be doubted, that he which knew no sinne, neither receiued the gift by measure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke such Miracles as were the witnesses of his Godhead, and for such are recorded, to confirme our faith? But to our purpose.

Vespasians miracles conuince Atheists that deny our Sauiours miracles.

(15) When Vespasian had liued threescore and nine yeeres, seuen moneths, and seuen dayes, and had raigned ten yeers, as Eusebius sayth, he died peaceably in his Bed; which no Emperour since Augustus euer did; hauing beene a great Scourge & Instrument of God against the miserable Iewes; whose kingly race from Dauids line hee sought by all meanes to extirpate, that so all their hopes and expectations might for euer be cut off.

CHAPTER XIII.

Fitted with all heroicall vertues.

His imployment in former times.

Ioseph bell Iud. lib. 6. & 7.

An. Do. 81.

REsently vpon the death of this Emperour, Titus his eldest sonne, sirnamed Flauius Vespasian, without any contradictiō was receiued & obeyed for his rightful successor: as well for that his father in his life time had made him his Partner in the Empire, & at his death by Testamēt declared him his Heire; as also for the generall opinion conceiued of him, who for his in-bred goodnes & noble conditions, was called & esteemed the louely darling & delight of mankind. Indeed of a most comely presence he was, & fitted therunto with all heroicall vertues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Oratour, a skilfull Musitian, and could by artificiall characters write both very fast and very faire.

Titus made Emperour with out all contradiction.

Called the delight of mankind. Sueton. in vit. Tit. Sect. 1.

(2) His youth he spent in Militarie qualities, and serued in Germany and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Iury warred with the like glory; which is nothing impaired by the learned stile of his Recorder Iosephus, vnto whom againe for these affaires I must referre the curious reader.

(3) Ierusalem, with the slaughter of eleuen thousand Iewes, euen on the birth day of his daughter, with such honour he wonne, that thereupon presently he was saluted Emperour, euen in the life time of Vespasian his Father: & from that day carried himselfe as his Associate in the Empire; for with him hee Triumphed, and with him he iointly administred the Censorship, his Colleague he was in the Tribunes authority; and his companion also in seauen Consulships: In all which, though the Edicts went forth in his fathers name, yet were they penned by himselfe. Of this this his victory ouer the Iewes, he left the remembrance to posterity by stamping vpon the reuerse of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expressing his Triumph and the Iewes ouerthrow, which in the front of this Chapter wee haue also placed.

He wonne Ierusalem in the life time of his Father.

His faults.

(4) Somewhat hee was blemished with the loue of Berenice, the beautifull Queene of Iewry, & much more with the murther of Aulus Cinna, only through iealousie conceiued of her; and whether that was the sinne whereof at his death hee repented, is vncertaine, when lifting vp his eyes to Heauen; hee complained why his Life should be taken from him, that excepting one offence deserued not to die. As himselfe in glory weilded the Emperiall Scepter, so did his Substitutes gouerne the Prouinces; at which time in BRITAINE, Agricola was President, and therein had spent almost two yeares vnder the raigne of Vespasian, In such manner as we haue declared.

His repentãce at his death.

Tacit. in vit. Agric.

(5) In his third yeare, hee discouered new Countries and parts of this Iland, yet vntouched, or at leastwise not thoroughly subdued, as altogether vnsatiate of that which was gottẽ, & sought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compasse; therefore marching Northward to the Frith of * Taus, wasted all as he went, and without any resistance fortified the place with Castles and Bulwarkes, which he stored with sufficient prouisiõ; where euery Garrison wintring, garded it selfe, & with the Summers seruice, euer repaired the Winters euents, whereby euermore the Enemy went to the worse, and his designes prospered as himselfe wished.

Agricola enlargeth the Empire.

TVEED, as is thought.

(6) The fourth Summer was spent in perusing & ordering that which hee had ouer-runne. And if the glory of the Roman name could haue permitted, or so beene satisfied, it needed not to haue sought other limits of Britaine: for [a] Glota and [b] Bodotria, two armes of two opposite Seas, shooting farre into the Land, & onely deuided asunder by a narrow partition of ground, the same was both garded and fortified with Castles and Garrisons: so that the Romans were absolute Lords of all the South-side, and had cast the Enemy as it were into another Iland.

[a] The frith of Dunbretton.
[b] Edenborough frith.

(7) In this state stood the Prouince of Britaine at the death of Titus, whose short raigne hath left no long matters of discourse, and his Acts greater vnder other Emperours, then when he was Emperour himselfe; yet that little time wherein hee gouerned, was with Iustice, Liberality, and Loue of all. A great Enemy hee was to Promoters, Pettifoggers and Extortours of penall lawes, which Cancker-wormes of Common-wealths, & Catterpillers to Courts of Iustice, he caused to be whipped and banished out of Rome. Louing and familiar he was to all his Subiects, and so desirous to giue them satisfaction, that his vsuall saying was, No man ought to goe sad from the speech of a Prince. Mercifull he was to the poore, & so ready to doe them good, that one day being spent by him without any notable action, in sorrow he said: I haue quite lost a day. He died the thirteenth of September, the yeare from Christs Nativity eighty three, when hee had raigned two yeares and two moneths, and in the two and fortieth yeare of his age being poisoned by Domitian his Brother and Successor.

Titus gouerned with loue of all.

CHAPTER XIV.

Domitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himselfe,) as farre differed from him in vertuous conditions, as he was linked neere him in consanguinity of bloud: His youth not spent in armes with his Father and Brother, but inertiously consumed in lasciuiousnesse and penurie.

Sueton. in vit. Domit. sect. 1.

(2) At Rome hee was in the Vitellian troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, he had beene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister vnknowen, thence escaped: which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, he gorgeously built for a Temple to to Iupiter his ſuppoſed Preſeruer, and conſecrated himſelfe in the lap of that heatheniſh Idoll. He very ſpeedily apprehended the hope of an Empire, for no ſooner was his Father made Emperour, but that he aſſumed the name of Caſar, and in Rome carried himſelfe with ſuch prodigality, and ſo liberally made promiſes of the Imperiall Offices, that his father hearing thereof, ſaid, he marueilled why his ſonne ſent not one to ſucceed him in his place. But to diſſemble and cloake his idle conceits he gaue himſelfe to the ſtudy of Poeſie, (although with little affectiõ as the end prooued) for which notwithſtanding both Pliny and Martial doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very ſhadow of a good quality in Princes and great ones: and ſo doth Iuuenal and Suetonius prayſe his braue minde; for his ſhewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not onely men but women alſo were brought, and forced to fight for their liues with wilde beaſts: a cruell ſpectacle neuertheleſſe and vnbeſeeming to humanity.

(3) His firſt entrance into ſtate and dignity was neither greatly applauded nor gainſaid, hee ſeeming to carrie an equall mixture, and his vertues to hold leuell with his vices. But ambition now ſupported with Soueraignty, did quickly ſet the ſcale onely for the worſe ſide. The affaires of the Empire hee altogether neglected; and impatient of labour, or affection to Armes, daily retired into a priuate chamber or Gallery, wherein he vſually applied himſelfe onely to catch Flies, and with the point of a bodkin to pricke them thorow: whereupon one being asked what company was with the Emperour, replied, Not ſo much as a flie. In which princely exerciſe let vs a while leaue him, and returne to his better emploied Lieutenant Agricola.

His vaine miſpending of the time.

(4) Who now in the fift yeere of his gouernment tooke the ſeas, and with many proſperous conflicts ſubdued ſome adiacent places and people, before that time vnknowen; and furniſhed with forces thoſe parts of Britaine, which lay coaſted againſt Ireland: to which Country alſo he had a minde, and would often ſay, that if the Romans were therin planted, the liberty of the Britaines would ſoone be baniſhed quite out of ſight, and out of hope.

Agricola his opinion of Ireland.

(5) Now in the ſixth yeere of his Prefecture, becauſe a general riſing of all the farther Nations beyond Bodotria was feared, and paſſages were all beſet with power of the Enemies, hee manned a Fleet to ſearch the creekes and harboroughs of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Army marched further North. The Britaines hereat (eſpecially at ſight of their ſhips) much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the ſecrets of their Seas were al diſcouered, and no refuge left if they were ouercome; armed themſelues with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a moſt puiſſant and ſtrong Nation in thoſe parts) the formoſt; who, as challengers, braued the Romans ſo boldly, and in ſuch manner, that ſome counſelled the General to retire his forces on this ſide Bodotria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to be repelled with ſhame.

(6) Agricola, whoſe courage could not be clouded with any daſtardly feare held on his intents; and hearing by priſoners taken, the manner of his Enemies proceedings, ordered his hoſt accordingly, diuiding his Army into three battels, and ſo lay entrenched; the weakeſt whereof, containing the Ninth Legion, the Britaines by Night aſſailed, and hauing ſlaine the Watch, brake into their Campe with a furious noyſe: to whoſe reſcue, Agricola ſent his Light horſemen, and a Band of foot, whoſe Enſignes and Armour glittering in the appearance of day, ſo rebated the edge and further purpoſes of the Britaines, that they gaue backe to the gates of the Trench; where, in the ſtraites the conflict was ſharpe and cruell, till in the end they were forced to quit the field. Vpon this battle ſo manfully fought, and ſo famouſly won, the Romans preſuming that to their proweſſe all things were now eaſie & open, cryed to leade into Caledonia, and to find out the limits of Britain, with a courſe of continued conqueſts: & thoſe which erewhile were ſo wary and wiſe, waxt forward and bold after the euent, and grew to ſpeake bigly: ſuch being the hard condition of Warres, that if ought fall out well, all challenge a part; misfortunes are onely imputed to one. Contrariwiſe, the Britaines preſuppoſing that not valour, but skill in the Generall by vſing the occaſion, had caried it away, abated no whit their wonted courage, but armed their youth, tranſported their Children & Wiues into places of ſafety, and ſought by Aſſemblies and Religious rites to eſtabliſh an Aſſociation of the Cities together. And ſo for that yeere yeare both partyes did depart, incenſed to further preparations.

(7) In the beginning of the next, Agricola ſending his Nauy before, which by vnexpected ſpoilings in ſeueral places ſhould induce a greater and more vncertain terrour; followed himſelfe with his Army by Land: hauing drawne to his party ſome of the valianteſt Britaines, whom by long experience in Peace, hee had found moſt faithfull for his Warres: and ſo arriued at the Mount Grampius where the Britaines had lodged themſelues before, & as men nothing deiected by the vnfortunate chance of the former battaile, had now prepared themſelues, attending onely for Reuenge or Seruitude. And being taught, that common danger muſt be repelled with mutuall Concord by Leagues and Embaſſages they aſſembled the power of all their Cities together, aboue thirty thouſand armed men, as by view was taken; beſides an endleſſe number of youth which daily flocked vnto them, and many luſty Old men renowned in the former warres, bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time, Galgacus, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, ſeeing the multitude hotly demaund the Battell, is ſaid to haue vſed this or the like ſpeech.

The Romans wanton in peace.

Their Army compoſed of diuers nations

They are deſtitute of many encouragements.

Many Cities in factions.

(9) This ſpeech was ſo vehemently deliuered, & ſo cheerefully of them all receiued, that with Songs and confuſed acclamations (after their accuſtomed faſhion) they cluſtered together on heaps, and ſome of the boldeſt aduanced forward, whileſt Agricola likewiſe was incouraging his men, who ſtraight waies ranne to their weapons, and ruſhed on furiouſly toward the Enemy.

(10) The Britaines were marſhalled in the higher ground, fitly both to the ſhew, and to terrifie: the firſt Battalion ſtanding on the plaine, the reſt on the aſcent of the hill, knit & riſing as it were one ouer another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots & horſemen. Agricola ſeeing their number to exceede his, drew his battaile in length, and leauing his horſe, aduanced himſelfe before the Enſignes on foote.

The number of Britaine exceeded the Romanes.

(11) In the firſt aſſault before the ioyning, both ſides encountred with diſcharging of their darts; wherein the Britaines, employing both art and valour, with their great ſwords & little Targets, auoided the volue of the Romans, ſhowring downe withall great ſtore of theirs vpon them, wherewith they were both galled & ſore wounded. Agricola ſeeing his men thus ſtoutly reſiſted, tooke another courſe: for, ſpying the aduantage, he commanded three [a] Batauian Cohorts, and two of the [b] Tungrians, to preſſe forward, and bring the matter to handy ſtrokes and dint of ſword, a thing which (in reſpect of their long ſeruice) they were very expert in, but contrariwiſe to the Britaines very preiudiciall, by reaſon of their little Bucklers, and huge ſwords, being blunt pointed, & no wayes fit for the cloſe in fight. This command aduantaged the Romans much; for theſe with the pikes of their Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, ſo mangled the faces of the Britaines, that they were not able to ſtand before them; and the reſt gathering courage vpon emulation of theſe, aſcended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way, ſo that many halfe dead and ſome wholy vntouched, were ouer-paſſed and left for haſte of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themselues with the battle of footmen, and the troopes of horsemen began for to fly: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselues, by the vneuennesse of the ground and thicke rankes of the enemy, and were forced to fight standing still, & by the main weight of horses to beare downe one another. The wandring Wagons also, and masterlesse horses, as chance or feare did guide them, ouer-bare many times their friends and thwarted their way that met them.

The Britaines Chariots disorder the horse men.

(12) The other Britaines that kept the hill, & had leisure to behold the manner of fight beganne to come downe by little and little, and sought to compasse the backe of the enemy; which intent Agricola soone preuented, by sending foure wings of Horsemen retained purposely about him for sudden dispatches and chances of warre. These so fiercely assailed them, that a most sharpe and bloudy battle ensued, wherein the Britains on each side were beaten downe and slaine. notwithstanding many of them shewed both valour and reuenge euen to the end; the rest disbanded, turned their backes, and fled toward the desert; whose pursuit was followed vntill Night, and fulnesse of bloud made an end of the chase.

The fight fierce on both sides.

The Britaines discomfited.

(13) Of the Romans side were slaine (if we must credit their owne friends) onely three hundred and forty persons and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus [a] Atticus, Captaine of a Cohort, who vpon a youthfull heate and fiercenesse of his horse, was carried amidst his enemies. Of the Britaines fell ten thousand, and their designes so defeated and broken, that as desperate men, they forsake their houses, and in despight set fire on them themselues: the hurt persons they carry and draw with them, and call them that are vnhurt, hoping to bee releeued by them. One while they chose out holes to lurke in, for their liues safety; eftsoones in great haste forsake them, as doubting therein their owne security. Dispersed a-sunder, they lament and attend death: assembled together, they expostulate of their meanes and life: one while conceiuing a glimmering of some small hope, another while deiected with vtter despaire: Somtimes at the sight of their deerest beloued, moued to pitty; but much oftner stirred to rage, for reuenge; and many of them, euen by way of compassion, slew their deerest Wiues & Childrē, to rid them from their future miseries.

(14) Agricola hauing made euery wher a desolation and silence, withdrew his Army towards the * Horrestians, where taking hostages for their fidelity sent the Admirall of his Nauy to saile about the North Coasts of Britaine, who with strength and store tooke the Seas; their terrour gone already before, himselfe with easie and gentle iourneys disposed his foot and horsemen in their Wintring places, and planted Garrisons vpon the Borders betweene Glota and Bodotria. (16) This State affaires in Britanny, Agricola signified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Domitian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and grieued heart, receiued the Newes, being inwardly pricked with feare and disdaine, that his late counterfeit Triumph of Germanie (wherein certaine slaues bought for money, were attired, and their haire dressed as Captiues of that Country) was had in derision, and iustly skorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victory of so many thousand enemies subdued and slaine, was currant and famous in euery mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a priuate mans name should bee exalted aboue his Prince. In vaine then had hee suppressed the study of Oratory, and other worthy politick Artes, thereby to keepe down other mens reputation, if he should in Military glory be disseised by another. And to bee a good Commander of an Army, was to be aboue priuate estate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to bee passed ouer.

With

With theſe and the like incentiues his minde was tormented; yet thought he it beſt to diſſemble his malice, vntill the heat of his glory, and loue of his ſouldiers were ſomewhat abated. And forthwith he commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, ſtatue, honours, and what elſe vſually conferred in lieu of Triumph; he yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like policy alſo, hee was ſhortly diſplaced. For Syria, by the death of Atilius Rufus, lay deſtitute of a Lieutenant, and that place reſerued for men of great quality, Domitian gaue forth, was purpoſed for Agricola, and ſent him both his Patent, and Succeſſor into Britaine; who thereupon deliuered vp the Prouince in a peaceable eſtate vnto Saluſtius Lucullus, and returned to Rome.

The Moneths September and October he changed into the names of Germanicus and Domitianus, becauſe that in the one he entred his Empire, and in the other was borne. He cauſed his Statue to bee made in gold, and commanded, himſelfe to be called GOD. His cruelty euery way matchable to his pride. The Senatours and Nobles vpon ſmall ſurmiſes he murdered: many new tortures hee inuented: Confiſcations and Baniſhments, were fauours, not puniſhments. Chapter XV.

An. Do. 98.

HItherto haue wee pursued the succession in the British monarchy, together with the Inuasions, attempts, & successe of affaires for the Conquest of this Iland, vnder the first twelue Emperours of Rome: and that from such writers, who though they were most fauourable Registers of things done by the Romans, yet had they best meanes to know, and publish their Histories with warrantize of truth. But after the death of Domitian, died many Records, and the Prouinces proceedings (especially those that most concerne Britaine) left vncertaine; and therefore are neither with the like largenesse prosecuted, nor with the like authority auouched. And were it not that these Roman Emperours succeeding, did onely continue the succession of our British Monarches, many of them might be quite omitted; as neither themselues, nor deputies, allies, or enemies, once spoken of concerning our affaires; and the Gouernment of this Prouince, during those times, so maimed & defectiue (in respect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can bee obserued to the fitting of a continuall History. Yet as we finde it, let vs haue liberty to deliuer it, and rather to expose Truth in the meane attire that time hath left her, then by disguising her in richer roabes to abuse the World, and make her seeme nought else but a counterfeit, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

Domitian being dead, soon after many Records were lost.

(2) Domitian therefore thus made away Cocceius Nerua, a prudent, honourable, & aged person, was elected Emperour by the Senate, assisted by Petronius Secundus, Captaine of the Pretorian Army, and Parthenius chiefe Chamberlaine, and one of the Murtherers of Domitian. His birth was noble, and of Italy in the City Narnia, and of the Prouince Vmbria: ruling so well as he may be esteemed too good a Prince, long to continue in so bad an age.

Cocceius Nerua aged and prudent.

(3) What Lieutenants vnder him were in Britain, or vnder his Successor Traian, I find not in Record: but our English writers from the Arch-Deacon of Monmouth, bring a succession of British Kings, and amongst them Marius, who conquered Roderick, King of the Picts accompanied with the Scots; whose Trophie erected neere vnto Carleill, remained a long time after, bearing the inscription of his victory: and after him his sonne Coilus brought vp in Rome all the time of his youth, retained their fauours, and paid them tribute without constraint. Albeit by Iuuenal, it seemeth that Aruiragus the father of Marius, a great resister of the Romanes, liued in the raigne of Domitian, as hath beene touched, vnlesse you will say, that Meurigus and Aruiragus was the same Marius, as a worthy Antiquary affirmeth. But through these vncertainties and disagreements occasioned by the silence of better Authors, our Histories rest doubtfull, and so must wee leaue them, returning to finish vp briefly the Raigne and Life of this good Emperour Nerua.

Sextus Aurelius

Traian raised the Romans to the highest glory.

Dion Cass li. 68

Indicus neuer herrd of the Romans till Traians time.

Traians affability and moderation towards his Subiects. Entropius.

TRAIAN succeeded Vulpius Traian in the Romane Empire; borne neere vnto Siuill in the Territories of Spaine: of a noble family, but was much more enobled in himselfe for his princely endowments, which moued Nerua in his life time to adopt him into so high a calling, & the whole Senate after his death ioyfully to confirm his Electiō, & so often to honour him with the title of the most excellent Prince in publike dedications, as on the Coyne aboue.

(2) He raised the Romane Empire vnto the very highest pitch of glory, & spread the power of their cōmand into the largest circuit that euer before or since had or hath beene possessed. For the Kingdome of Dacia he subdued; Armenia, Parthia, & Mesopotamia made subiect; Assyria, Persia, and Babylon conquered; passed Tigris, and stretched the confines of the Roman Empire, vnto the remotest dominions of the Indies, which neuer before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed if we looke vpon his politicke managing of the gouernment, he may seeme (in comparison of others) a right worthy memorable & louely Prince, of much affability, aud Familiarity euen with his inferiours, and of such cariage towards his subiects, as he himselfe would wish his Prince (he sayd) to vse towards him if he were a Subject. A great obseruer also of Iustice, insomuch that when he inuested any Pretor, in giuing him the Sword, he commanded him to vse the same euen against his owne person if he violated Law or Equity. But yet against the good Christians he vsed neither of both: nay, hee stirred vp their Third Persecution, wherein Ignatius and many other worthy Saints of God, receiued the Crowne of Martyrdome, in such cruell manner, as that his other vertues are much clouded by that taxation: for mollification whereof, he was compassionately intreated by Plinius Secundus his Tutor; whose Epistles to that purpose are yet extant.

Dion Cassius. The third persecution of the Christians Euseb. Eccles. hist. lib. 3. c. 30.

(3) The Iewes in his time rose vp in armes against the Gentiles, and in Cyrene, Aegypt, and Cyprus slew a great number: against whom Traian sent his Captaines with forces sufficient, and in diuers parts of the Empire put the Iewes to death, in such infinite numbers, as that Massacre is accounted the greatest Execution that euer had been in the world, God suffering this their punishment to light vpon them for their infidelity and obstinacy against his Christ.

Iewes made warre against the Gentiles.

Traian his slaughter vpō the Iewes the greatest that euer was.

(4) Finally after his conquests in the East, returning towards Rome, at Seleucia in Asia the lesse, himself was conquered by the stroke of death, by a fluxe, the seuenth day of August, after he had raigned nineteene yeeres six moneths, and fifteene dayes, the yeere of our redemption one hundred and eighteen, & of his age sixty foure: whose ashes brought to Rome, were inclosed within the Crowne of a goodly Pillar wrought of one intire stone containing one hundred forty foot in height:

Dion, Cassius, Polychr. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(5) Of stature hee was bigge, of complexiō swarty; thinne of haire both head and beard, a hooked nose, broad shoulders, long hands, & a pleasant eye, whose liuely Image was borne in Triumph after his death, and that in most glorious and pompous manner, in celebration of his great renowne and fame attained in his life.

Traians portraiture.

(6) How silent soeuer Writers haue beene for this Emperours affaires in this our Iland, yet it is to be thought that vnto this, as well as vnto other Prouinces both Propretors, Lieutenants, Presidents, Pretors, and Proconsuls were sent, and euery City to haue their municipall Magistrates. The Pretor that yeerely proclaimed solemne Sessions, wherin himselfe sate aloft vpon a high tribunall seate, and guarded with his lictors about him in great estate, did execute his authority throughout his owne jurisdiction, and determined all causes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were inforced to receiue a new ruler euery yeere. And surely as this yoke of bondage was grieuously borne of euery Prouince, vpon whose necke, it was imposed and layd: So the Britaines vnderwent the weight of that subiection with such vnwillingnes, that in the time of this Traian they reuolted and rebelled, though presently surprised, as it is euident out of Spartianus.

(7) The care that this good Emperour had for the weale of his subiects is projected by his prouidence in making wayes passageable from place to place, whereof remaine many testimonies by those his Causeis drawne with wonderfull diligence, euen thorough the whole Iland; which now, though dismembred and cut in peeces by the Country people where thorow they passed yet doe many remnants thereof remaine, especially in pastures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes so high, that euidently they shew themselues. Of these Causeis Galen writeth as followeth: The wayes (sayth hee) Traian repaired by pauing with stone, or raising with bankes cast vp such peeces of them as were moist and miry: by stocking vp and ridding such as were rough and ouer-growne with bushes and bryers: by making bridges ouer Riuers that could not be waded thorow: where the way seemed longer then needeth, by cutting out another shorter: if any were by reason of some steepe hill, the passage were hard and vneasie, by turning it aside thorow easier places: now in case it was haunted with wilde beasts, or lie waste and desart, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and withall laying leuell all vneuen and rugged grounds.

A long these Causeis the Emperour caused to be set little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in them, to signifie how many miles was from place to place. Of these Sidonius Apollinaris writeth thus.

Antiquis tibi nec teratur agger;
Cuius per spatium satis vetustis
Nomen Cæsareum viret columnis.
Breake not the ancient Causeis strong,
Whereon the Columnes stand along,
Nor names of Cæsars doe not wrong.

CHAPTER XVII.

AN.D.119. AFter the decease of Traiane, his Nephew Aelius Hadrianus, by the consent of the Army, who swore to him obedience, was proclaimed Emperour; the Senate likewise confirming their choice, as being a man indued with gifts both of Art and Nature; answerable to the fortunes of his Estate.

His birth was of Spaine; in the City Italica, neere vnto Siuill, where Traian was borne; his father Noble, and his mother in Cales descended of an honourable stocke. (2) A

(2) A great Mathematician hee was, skilfull in Arithmeticke, Geometry, Astronomy, and judicious Astrology; learned in the Greeke and Latine Tongues; in which languages hee wrote both Poesie and Prose: well seen in Physicke, and knew the Vertues of Hearbes, Rootes, and Stones: A singular Musitian both for Theory and Practise, & could both limme and carue with approbation of the skilfull: but aboue all, the admirable report of his Memory, who neuer forgot any thing that he either read or heard.

Hadrian of an admirable memory.

(3) His first businesse for the Empire, was rather a care to hold securely what was gotten, then by inlarging the bounds to endanger the best: and therefore lessening the Compasse, and bettering the strength, he planted his forces along the Riuer Euphrates, and assigned that for the Easterne limits, leauing out India, Armenia, Media, Assyria, Persia, and Mesopotamia, as Countries too remote for the Romans, to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Prouinces tooke occasion to reuolt, thirsting after Liberty, and among others the Britaines (as euer most impatient of Seruitude) attempted alterations, whose Lieutenant Cneus Trebellius (Successor to Iulius Agricola) could not so gouerne his Souldiers which were growne out of discipline, and by long rest farre out of order, but that they fell at variance among themselues, and disquieted the most peaceable of the Britaines by their licentious manners.

Britaines attempt alteration.

Cneus Trebellius Lieutenant of the Britains

(4) The Northerne Inhabitants, that were more at liberty, and imboldened by their Bogs and Rocks vnaccessable, set themselues to withstand their wrongs, to whom also many others ioyned their affections and forces, wherupon some bickring insued with losse and bloud (to represse which) Iulius Seuerus was sent by Hadrian: but ere he could settle the commotion, was againe recalled and imployed in Syria, to suppresse the Iewish rebellion.

(5) These stirres here still continuing the Emperour tooke it to bee of such importance, that hee resolued in Person to addresse for Brittanny, which he performed in his third Consulship; the yeere of Christ one hundred twenty foure, attended on by three Legions: of which his Army for this exploit was then composed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memory of this vndertaking: With these hee encountered the Northerne Riders, recouered such holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Woods and Mountaines, whither the Romane Horsemen without danger could not pursue them. But perceiuing the Aire too sharpe for the Romanes constitution, and the Soile rough and of lesse profit then the rest, hee made a Fortification or strong Wall of Earth; which (as Lampridius sayth) did continue on the West, from Ituna, that is, the Riuer Eden in Cumberland neere Carleil) vnto the Riuer Tina or Tine, at Newcastle in Northumberland, in the East; & was no lesse then eighth miles in length. This Wall (sayth he) was made of stakes driuen deepe into the ground, and bound together in the manner of an hedge; and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwarke, to defend the Incursions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours that dayly molested the peace of the Romans. Hadrian his worke finished, and the Pronince reduced to the obedience of the fatall Gouernesse Rome, at whose feet he laid againe the name of Britaine, (as appeareth in the first Reuerse of his Coyne, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome and for his honourable aduenture and Expedition had his name inscribed vpon his Coyne with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

Hadrian himselfe came into Britaine to suppresse rebellion.

(6) Neither after this seemed the Southerne Britaines greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of subiection, which Time and Custome had made lesse painefull, the rather for that they say themselues to stand in neede of the Romanes helpe against the inroades of their owne Countrimen, whose cruelty was now as much feared, as in former times the Inuasion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themselues more willingly to the Romane Lawes, both in Martiall and Ciuill affaires: which were then principally directed by Licinius Priscus, who had been not long before imployed by Hadrian in the seruice of Iewry, and was at this present Lieutenant of Britaine.

Licinius Priscus Lieutenant of Britaine.

(7) This Iewish warre happened in the eighteenth yeere of the Raigne of Hadrian who suddenly assailed and slew where they came, both Romanes and Christians: for reuenge whereof, besides an infinite number of them slain and tortured, their City Ierusalem was also raced euen to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the same place, and the name thereof changed to ÆLIA: the Iewes vtterly banished thence, and as Aristion Pelleus

Ierusalem raced to the ground.

(8) But as this Emperour was exaspetated against the Iewes, so was hee gracious and fauourable to the Christians, & the rather at the request of Quatratus, a Disciple (as is supposed) of the Apostles, who wrote vnto him concerning them; and of Aristides a learned Philosopher of Athens, who made an Apology for their defence; so that the persecution then in practise was forbidden by Hadrian in a publike Edict; who as Lampridius writeth was minded to haue built a Temple to the seruice of Christ, had not some dissuaded him therefrom. In extremity of sicknes he designed Cæsar, Lucius Aelius whose Coyne wee haue hereunder expressed: A man deare to his Emperour, if we cõsider at how great a rate he bought for him the acceptation of the Commons and Military men: And how short a time the blaze of that honour continued: for he dyed so soone, that Hadrian himselfe had wont to say,

Ostendent terris hunc tantùm fata, nec vltrà

Spartianus, Dion Cassius, Polychr.

(9) When hee had raigned in great honour and loue, the space of one and twenty yeeres, fiue moneths, and fifteene dayes, he dyed, the eighth or tenth of July of a dropsie: which malady so tormented him, that willingly hee refused all sustenance, & languished away through faintnesse. Hee was of personage tall, and very strong, of a good complexion and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, & dyed aged sixty two, the yeere of our Lord God, one hundred thirty nine.

Vnder this Emperour M. F. CL. PRISCVS LICINIVS was the Proprætor of Britannie, and imployed in the Iourney of Iury with Hadrian, as appeareth by this antique Inscription in a broken Marble, found in the Picts Wall.

ANTONINVS PIVS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Antoninus Pius Emp.

Lollius Vrbicus Lieu.

An. D. 139.

NExt vnto whom succeeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) surnamed the Pious: and by the Senate Father of his Country. This man did not onely equall his Adopter and Predecessours, in wisdome and other princely qualities, but was also compared for his peace and policy, vnto Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome, who for his renowned gouernment, is so famously in their Histories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the son of Aurelius Fuluius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fuluius, that had been Consul, and held other Offices of dignity and State. The whole time of whose Raigne was so spent in peace, that small remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires, yet such as we finde in Britanny wee will deliuer.

Antoninus raigned in peace.

(2) At his first entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Christ, one hundred thirty nine (as appeareth by the mony minted in memory of the reduction of Britaine) the Northerne Britaines in that part of this Ile began to stirre, and made inroads into the Prouince, notwithstanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Against whom Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant here vnder Antoninus, brought his power, & with some skirmishes put them backe: taking from the Brigantes part of their Land, as a Mulct, for the waste they had done to the Genounians, a Prouince adioyning vnto the Brigantes, whose people had put themselues vnder the Emperours protectiō. Which done he repaired the Wall with stronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raised vp another not farre from the same, to double the defence: for (sayth Iulius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus, ouercōming the Britaines, built another turfe wall to diuide the Prouince, and to impeach the incursions of the barbarous. Notwithstanding the honour of this seruice (as is testified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Fronto) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himselfe: who, although absent and in his Palace at Rome, yet sitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterprise, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This wall also (as Clarenceaux coniectureth, hauing seen it so tracted in an ancient Chorographicall Chart) was drawen from the Riuer Tine vnto Carleil: but Time and VVar haue worne it now away.

(3) In the meane while a new insurrectiō was kindled among the [a] Brigantes, that annoyed some of the Roman Confederates; But by the discretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for vpon the first rumour of the Reuolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Army, commanding Seius Saturnius, Admirall of the British Fleet, to wafte vpon the North of the Iland, both to defend the Coast from danger, and also vpon occasions to further the Land-seruice, if need were: by which meanes, the Brigantes were easily reduced to obedience, euen by the presence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good seruice done in Britaine, during the short time of his imployment there, obtained the surname Britannicus. This may be the first figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Consulship of this Emperour) be cōiectured to haue hapned in the yeere of Christ one hundred forty one; and by inscription of the last Coine in that rank, it is manifest that there was some other expedition against Britaine the yeere following.

(4) I cannot omit, though not directly pertinent to our purpose, the care that this good Emperour generally had for the distressed and persecuted Christians (who no doubt by his bounty, enioyed much tranquillity here in Britain also) in whose defence hee wrote to his Deputies in Asia, and

I doubt not but "the Gods themselues haue a care that "wicked persons shall be brought to "light: for it much more doth appertain "vnto them, then it doth vnto you, to "punish such as refuse to yeeld them "worship. But this course which you "take, doth confirme them whom you "persecute, in this their opinion of you, "that you are impious men, and meere "Atheists; whereby it commeth to passe, "that they desire in the quarrell of their "God rather to die, then to yeeld to the "wils of such as you are, and to embrace "your forme of Religion. Let it not seem "vnseasonable to call to your remem- "brance the Earth-quakes, which lately "happened, and which yet are to your "great terrour and griefe; because I vn- "derstand that in such like accidents you "cast the enuy of such common misfor- "tunes vpon their shoulders, whereby "their confidence and trust in their God is "much the more increased: whereas you "being still ignorant of the true causes "of such things, doe both neglect the "worship of the other gods, & also banish "and persecute the seruice of the Immor- "tall God, whom the Christians doe wor- "ship; and you persecute to the death all "the embracers of that Profession. In the "behalfe of these men many of the Pro- "uinciall Presidents haue written before "vnto our Father of famous memory: to "whom he answered, that they should "not be molested, vnlesse they were "prooued to haue practised Treason a- "gainst the Emperiall State: and touching "the same matter some haue giuen no- "tice vnto me; to whom I haue answe- "red with like moderation as my Fa- "ther did before: And by this our "Edict doe we ordaine, that if any here- "after bee found thus busie in molesting "these kinde of men without any their "offence, we command that hee that is "accused vpon this point, be absolued, "albeit he be proued to be such a man "as he is charged to be, that is, a Chri- "stian: and he that is his Accuser shall "suffer the same punishment, which he "sought to procure vpon the other.

Iulius Capitol

This Edict was promulged at Ephesus in the Generall Counsell of all Asia: so fauourable was this good Emperour to the true Professours, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, hauing that Apothegme of Scipio Africanus rife in his mouth: That hee had rather saue one Subiects life, then kill a thousand Enemies.

Antoninus person & vertues.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a seemly presence, in countenance Maiesticall, in maners milde, of a singular wit, very learned and eloquent, a great louer of Husbandrie, peaceable, mercifull and bounteous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that thereby he set going wholly his own priuate estate and demaines; whereat when his Empresse much repined, hee told her, that when hee vndertooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and properties of a priuate Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his priuate wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may be aduanced. In fine, this large Euloge and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth hee did any thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, hauing raigned twenty and two yeeres, (some say twenty three) seuen moneths, and twenty six dayes, hee dyed of a feuer at Lorium the seuenth of March, the yeere of his life seuenty fiue, and of Christ one hundred sixty two.

FRom the vertuous example of the good EMPEROVR Pius, proceeded a branch of no leſſe towardlineſſe and fruitfulneſſe, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, Verus, Philoſophus, (for by ſo many honourable names is he remembred:) and although hee ſprung not from Pius, as from his natiue roote, yet was he his adopted Sonne, and graffed into his Stocke and alliance by the Marriage of his Daughter Fauſtina: He was the Son of Elius Verus who died Prætor, and whoſe Pedegree is brought from Numa Pompilius, the ſecond King of Rome; and his Mother was Domitia Camilla, daughter of Claudius Tullus.

(2) This man choſe to him for his Aſſociate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the ſon of Lucius Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him,) and therefore this Verus was reſpectiuely cõmended vnto Aurelius; betwixt whoſe natures & conditiõs was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night; The one very moderate, louing and induſtrious; the other proud, careleſſe, and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Chriſtians felt, whoſe chiefeſt pillars, Polycarpus, Biſhop of Smyrna, and Iuſtinus Martyr, an excellent Philoſopher, with infinite more, were put to moſt cruell deaths; and by him the fourth perſecutiõ of Gods Saints was begũ: whoſe licentious and bloudy life laſting in Authority the ſpace of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apoplexy in the preſence of Aurelius being then in expedition (towards Germany, whoſe coine wee haue here expreſſed as we find it minted with his face and reuerſe.

(3) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres againſt thoſe, who there reuolted, was incloſed about with his enemies, called the Quadi, and ſuffered great mortality both by Peſtilence, and much more by want of Water, whereby himſelfe and Hoſt were almoſt conſumed: At which time many Chriſtian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Ionas was) to call vpon their God; they fell proſtrate on the ground in prayers, & obtained of him ſo plenteous a ſhower of raine, as therewith after fiue daies extreameſt drought and thirſt, the whole Army was refreſhed, and the Quadi contrariwiſe by Thunder and Lightning were quite diſperſed and ouerthrowne.

(4) This wonder (ſayth Euſebius) is reported euen by thoſe Hiſtorians who fauored not Chriſtianity: and the prudent Epiſtle of the Emperour himſelfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the ſame: whereupon he both mitigated the rage againſt Chriſts Profeſſours, and (by teſtimony of Apollinaris) named that Legion of the Chriſtians, for an euerlaſting remembrance, The Lightning Legion.

So alſo Lucius Verus, (whom this excellent Emperour had in the yeere 162. as appeareth by his Coine of Concord, ſet in the entrance of his life, elected his College in the Empire) who to ſupply the defect of merit in him ſelfe, tooke from the Conqueſt of Auidius Caſsius, & other his Captaines in Armenia, Parthia and Media the Trophies of their victories with which he filled vp his Title, and adorned his Money, expreſſed in the beginning of this Chapter.

(6) About theſe times, albeit other things went not ſo happily with Britaine as might haue beene wiſhed, yet one felicity then befell her, which did both counteruaile her owne calamities; and ouerpoize the good fortunes of all other Nations: and that was the bleſſed reſt of the Goſpell of peace in this warring and vnpeaceable Kingdome, a great part thereof being gouerned at that time by King Lucius, ſurnamed Leuer-Maur. For that was the policie and ancient cuſtome of the Romans, as Tacitus ſaith) to vſe euen Kings themſelues for their inſtruments, to bring the people into bondage. And Antoninus Pius ending warre, permitted Kingdomes to be gouerned by their own Kings, and Prouinces by their owne Comites (as ſaith Capitolinus.) This King diſliking the Paganiſme and Idolatry of his people, (though as wee haue ſhewed, among many of them the truth of Chriſts Doctrine was both taught and embraced, euen from the firſt planting thereof) and being incited both by the exemplary life and piety of the Chriſtians, & alſo by the manifeſt miracles wrought amongſt them, and encouraged moreouer by the fauourable Edicts of the Emperours in their behalfe, and by the good affections & forwardneſſe of their Deputies heere, Trebellius and Pertinax, he gaue leaue to their Religion by publike warrant, and was the firſt Chriſtian King in the world, and Britaine the firſt prouince that embraced the Goſpell by publike authority, as Sabellicus ſayth.

POpe Eleutherius thus wrote to Lucius King of Britanny, for the reformation of the King and the Nobility of the Kingdome of Britaine: You desired vs to send vnto you the Romane and Imperiall Lawes; which you would vse in your Kingdome of Britanny. The Romane Lawes and the Emperours wee may at all times mislike, but the law of God by no meanes. By the diuine Clemẽcy you haue of late receiued in your Kingdome of Britanny the law and faith of Christ: you haue with you in your Kingdome both the Old and New Testament: out of them (in Gods name) by the Counsell of your State, take you a Law, and therwith by Gods permissiõ gouern your kingdome of Britanny: For you are Gods Vicar in your Kingdome, as the kingly Prophet saith, the earth is the Lords, and the plenty thereof, the whole world & they that dwell therein. And againe in the same Propheticall King; Thou hast loued righteousnesse and hated iniquity, wherefore, God, euen thy God, hath anointed thee with the oyle of gladnesse aboue thy fellowes. And again: Lord giue thy Iudgements vnto the king, and thy Iustice vnto the kings son. He sayth not, The judgement or justice of the Emperor. And the Kings sonnes are the Christian Nations, and People of the kingdome, such as liue and abide together in your Kingdome, vnder your Protection and peace; according to that in the gospell: As the Hen gathereth her Chickens vnder her wings. The Nations of the Kingdome of Britanny are your People, who being now seuered, you ought to gather them vnto Vnity, Concord and Peace, and reclaime them to the Faith and Law of Christ, and to the holy Church, to foster them, cherish them, protect and rule them, and alwayes to defend them from all injurious, malicious, & hostile attempts. For, Woe be to the kingdome, whose King is a child, & whose Princes rise early to banqueting: Neither doe I call a King a child, for the tendernesse of his Age, but for the folly and wickednesse and madnesse of his disposition: As that royall Prophet sayth: Wicked and blood-thirsty attaine not to halfe their Age, And by banqueting I meane glutttony; by gluttony, luxury; by Luxury all filthinesse, peruersity, and lewdnesse: according to that of King Salomon: Wisedome shall not enter into the wicked soule, nor shall it dwell in a body enthrald to Sinne. A King hath his name from Ruling, and not from his Kingdome: and so long shall you be indeed a King while you rule well, which if you doe not, the name of a king will not continue with you, but you shall lose that royall title; which God forbid. Almighty God grant you so to rule your Kingdome of Britanny, that with him, whose Vicar you are in your sayd kingdome, you may raign eternally: to whom with the Father, &c.

(9) The date of this Epistle (as by some other Copies it appeareth) being the year of the second Consulship of Commodus and Vespronius, may giue great light and satisfaction to such as are curious to know the truth, and to reconcile the differences of our Historians touching the time: That Consulship being about the yeare of Christ one hundred and eyghty:

which was at the beginning (if not a little before) of Commodus his raigne; and therfore wheras some refer it to the one hundred sixty ninth yeer after Christs Pasion, it is apparant to be the only error of transcribers, who so writ in stead of one hundred seuenty nine after his birth; which was anno currente, the very time of Commodus being Consul the second time: and on this yeere agree both forrain and domesticke writers of this matter. And albeit the very texture of this Epistle carrieth with it the true Character of Antiquity, yet because our worthy writers, mentioning this Epistle are charged of flat forgery (by such who challenge to be Masters in all ancient knowledge) we will adde somewhat to wash off those false aspersions, both from the Record and from the mentioners thereof.

Sabellicus. Iewell. Fox.

Parsons 3. Conuersions, Part. 1. cap 4.

Ibidem.

Their first exception is, that the Latine Copy would doubtlesse haue beene produced by them, if it had not been counterfeit. Where to what need we answer, sith now we haue produced it, and can produce as many, as there are Copies of King William the Conquerours Lawes, wherin it is expresly repeated? The next is, that the English translations of it differ each from others. A reason more childish then the former, sith euery man hath a seuerall conceit of that he translateth, and sometimes the very Originals, (by transcribers ignorance or omission) cause variety of translatiō, as may appeare in the variæ lectiones of this Coppy prefixed. The last, but most saucy and ignorant exception is, that the places of Scriptures mentioned in the letter, are so sottishly and senselesly applyed, as is vnworthy to be fathered on the learned Eleutherius. Let vs therefore in a word, bring the diuinity of this Grand-censurer to the touchst one: For Eleutherius proueth, first, that Kings are Gods Vicars in their kingdome, because the whole earth is properly Gods, & therfore Kings haue it not as their owne, but as his Lieutenants: next that as Dauid typically, and Christ impliedly, was by God annointed King, for the execution of Righteousnesse and Iustice, so euery godly King ought to make that the onely end of his high honor, that being by God aduanced he might likewise aduance Righteousnesse, Iustice, & the seruice of God whose vassall he is; and that therefore Gods iudgements and Lawes are to be preferred by them, before all humane Lawes: with which they should rule and cherish their godly subiects as their children: and protect them and gather them vnder one faith as Christ (their master) doth, who therefore compareth himselfe, to a Hen gathering her Chickens vnder her wings.

The defects of which Princely duties Elentherius most liuely expresseth afterward, in so proper applications, as if the learnedst fathers on these places be duely examined, they will be found no whit to exceede the apprehensions of this Godly Bishop. But if Robert Cowbuck, would haue cast his eye on the moderne Popes, and their Cardinals applications of Scriptures, what would he then say? God made a greater light and a lesse: therefore the Pope is as much greater then the Emperour, as the Sunne is bigger then the Moone. Christ sayd to Peter, Kill and eat: therefore the Pope may excommunicate and depose Kings (yea and Kill them too for a need.) Peter said Behold two swords; therefore the Pope hath both temporall and Spirituall Iurisdiction ouer the world. So God sayd to Ieremy, he should plant and transplant: therefore the Pope may dispose & transpose all Kingdomes at his pleasure. Christ to Peter, thou art Cephas, and Cephas is a head; therefore the Pope is head of the Church. Domini sunt Cardines Terræ. The earth is the Lords: therefore the Cardinals are the Lords of the Earth. On such pillers and applications of Scriptures, is the whole Papall greatnesse founded, and yet those late Scribes can scoffingly cauill at the godly applications of ancient Eleutherius. But to our purpose.

Cephas is a stone but all serues their turne.

(10) This Epistle with two other Preachers, Faganus and Damianus, sent vn to King Lucius, did not a little encourage him in his godly purpose, insomuch that receiuing Baptisme, the Temples of the Heathenish Flamins and Arch-Flamins euen thirty one in number, were conuerted into so many Christian Bishops Sees, whereof London, Yorke, and Carlein, now Saint Dauids, were made the Metropolitants of the prouince.

(2) At nineteene yeeres of age, hee was inueſted Emperour, his raigne not long, but life as looſe and impious as the worſt: in ſottiſh pride equalling Caligula, for intemperance another Vitellius, and in cruelties a ſecond Domitian. Three hundred Concubins continually he kept, and vpon one of them named Martia, ſo doted, that he wore her painted Picture vpon the out ſide of his Garment; and inſtiling his money Herculi Commodiano or Romano, which was ſtamped about the yeere 193. Sometimes (Hercules-like) would he ſhew himſelfe roabed in a Lions skin, bearing a Clubbe in his hand in ſtead of a Scepter: other whiles wantonly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman; alwayes coſtly, but ſeldome ciuill.

Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darting; and for ſome ſmall breathing of the perſecuted Chriſtians; which came not of himſelfe, but (as Xiphilinus writeth) by the mediation of Martia his beloued Concubine, who was found very fauourable to their doctrine: But the outragious wickedneſſe of his life made him ſo hateful to all, as that his deathwas often plotted; and once by ſome of the nobleſt, with whom Lucilla his own ſiſter conſpired; for which fact he put her with the reſt of the conſpirators, to death. The repreſſing of this incurſion (as it ſeemeth by ſome reuolt of the Prouince) was about the yeer of Chriſt one hundred eighty ſix, as appeareth by the monyes of this Emperor ſet in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of ſome worthy expedition and victory againſt the Britaines, he ſtamped them.

Vlpius Marcellus ſent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus is reported to be of a marueilous great temperance and ſtrange diet; for all the time of his aboade here he would eat no Bread, but ſuch as was baked in Rome, neither ſlept he more then would maintaine nature, whereby both his priuate buſineſſe and proiects for publike ſeruices were commonly diſpatched by night. Seuere he was in the execution of his place, not led by fauor of the perſon, nor ſtaid frō iuſtice by corrupted bribes; eſteeming Mony only for neceſſity, and riches no further then made for publike good: But thoſe his vertues though now with vs they get him honour, yet then did purchaſe him Enuy with the Emperor, Who liued (ſayth Lampridius) for his ſubiects miſchiefe, and his owne ſhame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, conſtrued his Praiſe to be his own reproach; and doubting leſt he ſhould grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and ſo ſent him Letters of diſcharge.

(6) The Army then feeling the raines looſe that ere-whiles had beene borne with a ſtiffer hand, fell ſtraight to a diſordered mutiny, and therein proceeded with ſuch boldneſſe as they openly refuſed any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soueraigne: At which time Perennius was a chiefe Agent and ſo ruled all in Rome for the Emperor, as that hee entertained a hope to bee himſelfe (in time) an abſolute and ſole-ruling Emperour; and hauing now fit occaſion offered to ſpread his power further, he took vpon him to redreſſe theſe diſorders (whilſt Commodus wallowed in his laſciuious idleneſſe) and diſplacing ſome worthy Captaines at his owne pleaſure, ſent other perſons of meane reſpect or parts, to command thoſe Legions in Britaine, that formerly had beene led by Noble Senators and men of Conſular dignity; whereby greater miſchiefe began to accrew and ciuill diſſenſions daily to burſt forth; the Army ſcorning their vpſtart Commanders: and the Captaines inſulting ouer the Souldiers, (of all ſides) the Aydes ſo diſquieted, that had the Britaines followed the aduantage, the whole Prouince at that time had beene in hazard to be loſt: vpon which diſtractions no leſſe then fifteen hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complaine their wrongs vnto Commodus: where charging Perennius to be the ſtirrer of theſe troubles, with an intent thereby to rayſe himſelfe or his ſonne to the Emperiall Maieſty (a ſtring that cannot be touched without ſound in a Soueraigns eare) they were ſo farre heard and beleeued that Perennius was to them deliuered to be put to death which accordingly they accompliſhed with all extremity.

Perennius deliuered to the Britiſh Souldiers to be put to death.

(7) Then was ſent for Lieutenant into Britaine Heluius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being riſen from the ſtate of a common ſouldier, to the dignity of a Conſull, and had beene Commander before that time ouer many Prouinces. Him had Perennius diſcharged from Britaine, and with diſgrace ſent and confined into Liguria, where he was borne, whoſe credit Commodus againe with ſuch fauors repayred, that he gaue him the Sirname Britannicus, which glorious title alſo himſelfe had taken about the yeer 184. At his firſt entrance and arriuage, he aſſayed by rough hand to ſuppreſſe the rebellions of the Army, & aduentured his perſon ſo farre in ſome tumults that he was ſtricken downe and left for dead: but afterwards proceeding with better aduice he compoſed thoſe troubles with moſt ſeuere puniſhments of the principall offenders: whereby notwithſtanding he preſently grew odious to all, and therupon ſo far feared his own ſafety, that he made ſuit to the Emperor to be diſcharged of his Lieutenantſhip.

in the Gouernment of Britaine, a man of great birth, forward enough, and fortunate: for which the Emperour Commodus either vpon fauour or feare, did honour him with the title of Cæsar, though Albinus seemed vnwilling to accept of the same, & afterwards discouered his disposition more openly in approuing the Ancient and free state of the Romans. For vpon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Britanny in fauour of the Senate, whose kind of Gouernment he much commended and preferred before the rule of the Emperors. Of which his affection when Commodus vnderstood, he sent Iulius Seuerus in all hast, to take charge of the Army: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, vntill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, and was wrought vpon this occasion. He hauing assigned many to dye, and to that end had inrolled their names in a scroll, it chanced Martia his Cõcubine to light on the same, wherein she saw her selfe allotted for one: & reuealing this his purpose to others that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their owne liues by his death: and with poison, stabs and strangling made him away, when he had liued one & thirty yeers, foure moneths, & viciously raigned thirteen yeers, eight moneths, and fifteen dayes, the yeere of Christs natiuity 193. the night before the Kalends of Ianuary.

CHAPTER XXI.

An.D.194. UPON the person of this Heluius Pertinax (of whom wee are now to speake), Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her Power, and from a very slender foundation to rayse the building of her owne Pride: His birth was but poore, & parents as meane, whose father from a seruile condition got to be free, & traded in Mercery wares for his liuing: himselfe educated according to his birth, rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all worldly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

Dio. Cass. li. 37.

(2) At first a Schoole-Master, & taught the Grammer; next a Ciuill-Lawyer, and pleaded cause in Courts; and lastly, a Martiall-man, and serued in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such fauourable successe, that within fiue dayes, out of the ranck of a common souldier, he was preferred to be Captain of a Cohort, in the Syrian wars against the Parthians, which ended, he was imployed into Britain, Misia and Germany, & also had charge in chiefe of a Fleet vpon the Flemish Seas: he serued likewise in Dacia with such honourable proofe of his valour, as that wise Emperor Marcus Aurelius held him in high esteeme and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was he assigned Gouernour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of credit and reputation that might bee; and from thence sent againe into Britaine, chosen out as the principall man of note for to stay the Commotions there raysed against Commodus; where in the Field hee was left for dead: but thence also returning after hee had gouerned foure seuerall Consular Prouinces, was created Proconsull of Africa, and immediately after Prefect of Rome. Neither yet made hee his stand there (though the greatest of any subiectiue degree) till he had mounted the Throne of Maiesty, and obtained the command ouer All: which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus; and by the meanes of Martia, Ælius, Lætus, and other conspirers of his end.

(3) For the Murther being done in the dead of the night, Lætus in great haste repayred to Pertinax his lodging; at whose sight the Old man in bed, expected nothing but Death, as ſuppoſing him ſent from Commodus to no other end. But Letus ſalutes him by the vnexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations vnto the Army, & in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great joy, hee was confirmed Auguſtus, Heluius Pertinax made Emperour.

Heluius Pertinax enuied by the Pretorian Cohorts.

(4) His firſt buſineſſe was to bridle the licentious liues of the Prætorian Cohorts & iniuries done by them vnto the Romane Citizens, which gained him ſuch hatred, that it was cauſe of his death: For theſe men growne diſordered and lawleſſe, in the raigne of Commodus, held themſelues wronged, to be now locked vnder the conſtraint of Lawes ciuill Gouernment: and theſe onely enuied the peace & proſperity of Pertinax, whereas all the Prouinces abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall vertues, layd aſide their weapons, and deſired to imbrace peace with a Prince ſo nobly qualified.

(5) The firſt that conſpired againſt his life, was one Falco; whom notwitſtanding hee freely forgaue, yet puniſhed certaine Souldiers thereto acceſſary: whereupon the reſt aſſembling themſelues in tumultuous & furious manner, with their drawn ſwords inuaded his Palace. Hee ſeeing their purpoſes ſought no eſcapes, but deſcending the Palace, met them in the baſe Court; At whoſe preſence aud Maieſty they were much amazed, and a while made a ſtand: vnto whom with great grauity, and with out ſhew of any feare, he thus ſpake vnto them.

" (6) Souldiers and Companions, if you " come to kill me, (as I thinke you doe) " you ſhall therein performe an act nei- " ther valorous nor otherwiſe very com- " mendable for you, no, nor any way " grieuous vnto my ſelfe; for euery " mans life hath his limit, & to mine, by " Natures courſe, the laſt period cannot " be farre: Or thinke you that I feare " death, who now am ſo ripened for it, " and haue already gotten the very " height of all renowne vpon my name? " Surely you are deceiued: but at this I " grieue; that my life and ſhort time of " Gouernment, which I had deuoted to " the good of all, ſhould ſeem ſo diſguſt- " full vnto any, as to deſerue a violent " and haſtned death, eſpecially by you, " who are by office, the Guarders of my " Perſon: you (I ſay) whoſe charge and " Oath is to ſecure your Soueraigne from " perill, and now ſeeke to ſheath your " Swords in his breaſt, ſhall either leaue " Teſtimony of my bad life deſeruing " it, or brand your places with ſuch " ſtaines of Treaſon, as Time ſhall neuer " weare away. And what I pray is mine " offence? for maintaining your Lawes? " Why, it was the charge your ſelues im- " poſed vpon me. Are Lawes too ſtrait? " Surely, not to the vertuous, who are " euen a Law to themſelues: Are they " needleſſe? why then were they made? " and being made, why ſhould they not " be executed? If the death of Commodus " grieue you, was I the cauſe? If he were " made away by Treaſon, your ſelues are " conſcious of my innocency. And this " I aſſure you, in the word of a Prince, " that his death ſhall depriue you of no- " thing, which you require, if you re- " quire nothing but that which is honeſt " and juſt. My life, whilſt I was a Subiect, " was ſpent with you in Warre, now (be- " ing your Soueraigne) is conſumed with " cares for your peace: which if you " free me of, by taking it away, my " troubles ſhall thereby end, but your " conſcience ſhall begin to grone vnder " the guilt of bloud, and perchance bee " touched with too late repentance.

(7) His words were ſpoken with ſuch a mouing grauity, and vnmoued reſolution, that the foremoſt in the attempt gaue back, and were aſhamed of their audacious enterpriſe; but the reſt furiouſly driuing forward, one Truſius with a Lance ran him into the Breaſt, whereupon Pertinax couering his Head with his robe, quietly yeelded his body to the traiterous ſtrokes of them all, and ſo died that poore, old, and innocent Emperour. The yeeres of his life, ſayth Iulius Capitolinus, were ſixty, ſeuen moneths, & twenty fiue dayes: But Dio, Spartianus & Herodian accounteth them to extend to ſixty eight; Euſebius to aboue ſeuenty: The like diſagreement there is for the ſhort time of his Gouernment: for Euſebius ſaith that hee raigned not fully ſix Moneths: Eutropius ſaith but three, Iulius Capitolinus & Aurelius Victor, eighty fiue dayes: Dio, Herodian and Spartianus, two Moneths and twenty eight dayes: how long ſo euer, thus he liued, and thus he dyed, the fifth Calends of Aprill.

CHAPTER XXII.

An. D. 194

THE ſtate of Man continually attended with vncertaine Chance, apparantly doth ſhew the weake condition that Nature enioyeth; and with what vnſureneſſe the Seate of Majeſtie is poſſeſt, as is ſeene by the precedent Emperour, who ſitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloued, and garded with the ſtrengths of Europe, Aſia, Africa, Aegypt, & Greece, was not with ſtanding ſurpriſed and ſlaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all eſcaping vnpuniſhed; the deede was ſo ſuddaine, and mens mindes ſo diſtracted, that it could not be fully beleeued, though witneſſed by ſight.

(2) The Senators miſtruſting each others, abandoned the City, and the Citizens in ſecret ſecured themſelues: all in an vprore, but none for reuenge of the treaſon: The murtherers, in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand ſtood vpon their gard: But ſeeing all in a maze, and nothing againſt them attempted, a further boldneſſe (the like neuer heard of before) enſued: for by a Common Cryer they made Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire, to any man that would giue them moſt: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honeſty of life, and a Lawyer ſayth Euſebius) who with larger promiſes, then euer were performed, obtained the Imperiall Diadem.

(3) His birth was in Millan, the ſonne of Petronius Didius Seuerus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himſelfe brought vp in ſeruice vnder Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius, by whoſe fauors he was firſt made Queſtor, next Edile, & then Pretor in Rome. In Germany as a Captaine he ſerued vnder Aurelius, then was he appointed Gouernour of Dalmatia, Bithynia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Conſul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconſul in Africa. Theſe were his riſings and meanes to that Maieſty, which not long he kept: for hated in Rome, and not approued abroad, Syria choſe for Emperor their owne Generall, Peſcenius Niger, Germany Septimius Seuerus: By whoſe conſent Clodius Albinus leader of the Britaine Army was firſt elected Caeſar, and then his fellow in the Empire; whereby the Eagle the faireſt of Birds became monſtrous, and in one body bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time hauing gotten again the gouernment of Britaine, where erecting his own Statues and ſtamping his picture in his Coynes, (as in the Chapter following thou mayeſt ſee) gaue great ſuſpition that hee intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army a foot meant to haue gained the Emperiall Seat it ſelfe, by aduantage of Septimius forces abſent in ſuppreſſing of Peſcenius; which to diuert, inforced Seuerus vntill better opportunity to declare Albinus his Companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former: becauſe Didius in Rome, and Peſcenius in Antioch conſumed their times in banquetting, and vnmartiall diſports, whiles Albinus managed his office moſt ſouldierlike, and was highly eſteemed and honoured of them.

(5) Seuerus haſting toward Rome, was met in Italy by Ambaſſadours from Didius with faire offers of peace, and poſſeſſion of halfe the Empire: but refuſing compoſition, and making ſtill forward, the Senate that ſo lately declared him a traytor, now proclaimed him an Emperour: And the Souldiers vnſatisfied of the couenanted promiſes, and in hope to purchaſe fauour with Seuerus, ſlew their Chapman Didius in his Palace, the Calends of Iuly, being but fiue dayes after he had done himſelfe as much for Pertinax, when hee had raigned, as Eutropius ſayth, ſeuen moneths: Spartianus ſayth but two, and Dio ſixty ſix daies: the yeer of his age fifty ſeuen, and of our Sauiours appearing in our fleſh, one hundred ninety and foure.

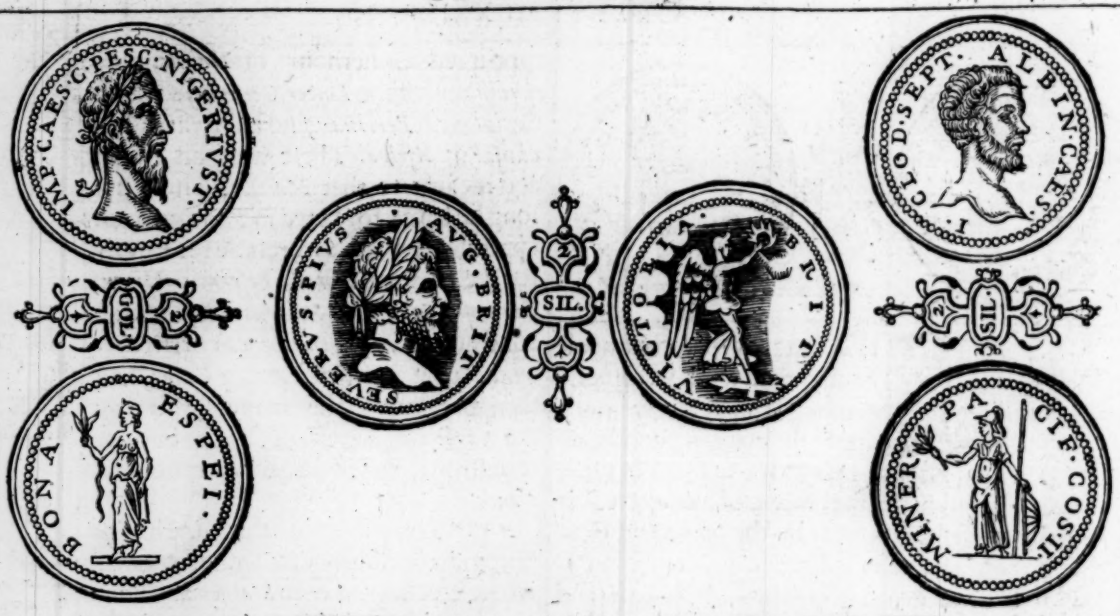
SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS.

CHAPTER. XXIII.



An. D. 194.

SEuerus hauing by this bloudy accident of the giddy multitude, gained with more facility then hee expected, the fatal ſeat of gouernment, it was his next care to ſuppreſſe Peſcenius, by force, and Albinus by falſhood: whoſe actions and liues ſince they hapned with this Emperour, and ended with his ſword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Peſcenius firſt, ſince firſt he fell vnder the fortune of this man.

This old man in the yeere of Chriſt, one hundred ninety foure, was elected Emperor by Acclamation of the Syrian Army, of which (though begun but by a handfull in reſpect of all the other imperiall forces) he had good hope, ſince to the honor of that Goddeſſe he dedicated the firſt marke of his Soueraignety, the minting of his money, as in the entrance of this Chapter is ſeen.

A perſon he was of ſeemely ſtature, louely feature and faire skin, except his Necke, which differing ſo far from the reſt gaue him the ſirname of Niger: his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voyce ſo piercing, that it would bee heard a mile off: and his haire for more ornament long hee wore in reflected curles vpon his ſhoulders. A commendable ſouldier and well bearing himſelfe in the military offices he vnderwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was ſeuere, and at home he ſo well acted his part when he was Conſul, as in his Clemency and Iuſtice hee ſeemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enioyed the goodnes of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had ſo parted: For no ſooner had he put on the Robe Emperiall, but Seuerus defeated Peſcenius his Army at Cyzicum, purſued him to Antioch, and tooke him at Euphrates, ſending to Bizantium his head a Trophy of the Conqueſt; and to his wife, children, and followers (vnto whom at firſt this Victor granted baniſhment) in the end denyed life.

(1) Now as ſoon as Seuerus made his approach neere Rome, he gaue command that the Pretorian Cohorts ſhould attend him diſarmed; which done, he vehemently checkt them for their proditorious trechery againſt Pertinax, and pronouncing ſentence, depriued them both of name, honour, and armes of Souldiers, and baniſhed them from Rome, and the circuit thereof for one hundred miles diſtance: which act of his wonne him ſuch reputation, that in Rome, the whole Story of Pertinax his ruine, and Seuerus his aſpiring to his Throne, was at large portraited in an excellent peece of worke, of ſolide molten braſſe, as Herodian relateth, though he aſcribeth the occaſion of it, to a dreame of Seuerus.

(2) Thoſe two obiects Didius and Niger, who gaue ſome hinderance to Seuerus.

Seuerus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, seemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether ouer-cast his brightnesse and glory, if it were not dispersed or blowne backe in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, he created him Cæsar and his Successor in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes thus swelling in the East, and himselfe still courted by Ambassadors from all parts, with their tender of subiection, hee began to grow proud, and to disdaine any Copartner in State: and thereupon first secretly sought the destruction of his Cæsar; which failing, he then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy in Rome.

Albinus made Successor in the Empire.

His death practised.

Proclaimed Traitor.

(3) Clodius Albinus brought into these vnexspected dangers, prepared his strengths, and with the choyce of all Britaine entred France, and neere vnto Lions tooke the field against the Emperour; but with no better successe, the Pescennius had done in Asia the lesse, in the same place (as Herodian, Eutropius & Spartianus affirme) where Darius was first ouerthrown by Alexander. The Armies ioyning, a bloody Battail was fought, which through the great prowesse of the Britains went at first so sore against Seuerus, that being beaten off his Horse, despairing of Victory, and almost of Life, cast off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himselfe. Lætus one of Seuerus his Captaines, kept aloofe all this while, of purpose as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine; and now vpon report that he was slaine, came on most furiously with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himselfe: whereupon the Emperour drawne againe into the field, the day was his by the meanes, but not the meaning, of Lætus: whom on attainder of his Treason he afterward put to the sword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was slaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Seuerity and Martiall discipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant: and in the time of his seruice in this Iland, there was no toile which he commanded his souldiers, but himselfe would beare therein a part, euen in carrying of burdens on his Backe: and yet so farre from vaunting of his valour, as that when an Historian would haue recorded his noble Acts he willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom he neede not to flatter; holding it a foppery to write of those, of whose fauour or wrath the Inditers stood in hope or feare. Being such a one, no maruaile if Seuerus so feared him, as hee did, which hee shewed euen after hee was slaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Personages both in the City and Prouinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all, that they wished well to Albinus.

He wageth warre against Seuerus.

Albinus vanquished by Seuerus.

After this ouerthrow Seuerus forthwith sent Heraclianus hither, to keepe the rest of the Britaines in quiet, and to bee Lieutenant in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus writeth: Of whose affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it seemeth by a Coyn of Seuerus minted in his second Consulship, which fell in the yeere of our Sauiour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his last Competitor, that the Britaines gaue not at first their seruice and seruitude to this man, vntill he had made the purchase of it by his sword; the brand of which he hath left to posterity in figuring the goddesse Victory seated vpon spoyles, and writing in a shield, Victoria Britan.

Spartianus.

Vnto this Lieutenant, Virius Lupus succeeded President of Britaine, as Vlpian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety seuen, as appeareth by this Inscription erected at Olinaca amongst the Brigantes, in memory of the reedifying of that place by this Emperor and his eldest Son, then first designed Cæsar, by which the time is discouered, and in this stone inserted.

Virius Lupus made President of Britaine.

(6) Seuerus thus entred Britaine, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of that Prouince, and to gouerne thoſe parts that ſtood in quiet, aſſiſted by Aemilius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whoſe Tribunall ſeat was held in Yorke; himſelfe and Baſſianus marching further into the North againſt the Maata and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themſelues boldly vpon the aduantage of their Countries, their waters brackiſh, & vnholſome drinke for their Enemies, the aire ſharpe & contagious to their conſtitutions, & the ſoile it ſelf ſo peſtred with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of bridges, and in drayning of Meares, ſo that by diſtemperature of diet, continuall labour, contagiouſneſſe of Aire, and afflictions by ſickneſſe, fifty thouſand of them periſhed, & that without Battaile, ſayth Dio: many Souldiers alſo, whoſe ſpirits were ſpent, and through feebleneſſe could not keepe ranke in their march, were for meere pitty ſlaine by their fellowes, leſt they ſhould fall into the hands of their Enemies.

---- PRAELEGIO ----

A wall from Sea to Sea.

And neglecting the vttermost and vast Northerne parts of this Iland, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might serue as a Rampire and diuision betwixt the sauage & more ciuill people, stretching it selfe thorow the whole Iland, euen from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Itun (otherwise Solwey frith) in Scotland, to the doore of Tine or Tinmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two Miles, as Sextus Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, & others account them, & by * some more. This Wall he built of Turfes and Timber, strongly fenced with Bulwarkes and Turrets, neere vnto (if not vpō) the foundation of Adrians wall, the tract whereof thorow the Countries of Westmoreland and Northumberland, is more pleasing to be seene, then easie in word to be expressed. For which his Acts thus heere atchieued about the yeer of grace two hundred and eleuen, he assumed to himselfe his much desired Sirname Britannicus Maximus, causing in his owne and his sonnes Coynes that inscription to bee stamped.

Herodian. Spartian Polydor. Virg. de rebus Angl. lib. 2. Hector Boetius.

Seuerus surnamed Britannicus Maximus.

(9) And recording to posterity the glory of his first atchieuement here, vpon the reuerse of those his monyes, whereon he sometimes formed a Trophy erected vpon spoiles, with two Captiues, vndersetting the word VICT. BRIT. sometimes a winged victory: grauing a Shield, hung on that tree which is the meede of Conquerours, VICTORIÆ BRITANNICÆ: and sometimes in such a forme & phrase as is expressed in the entrance of this his life. And now retired to Yorke, he left his eldest sonne to finish this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather allayed then altogether ended.

(10) Bassianus thus set in the one part of the Iland as Geta was in the other, sought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a loose liberty to doe what they list, then to manage the trust reposed on him by the restraint of Martiall Discipline, & action of Military duties: hoping by such his plausibility and indulgences to purchase to himselfe their best concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire; which he so thirsted after, as that he often tampered with them to raise him, by the fall of his father.

Bassianus disloyalty.

(11) The Caledonians vnderstanding the dissoluteness of his Campe, and the want of a better Captaine, suddenly assailed the Romans, putting many to the sword, and taking great booties, (which they dispersed among their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Couenants: whereat the testy old man was so much disquieted, and so farre enraged to reuenge, that he gaue an expresse charge to make a generall Massacre, without exception of any; vsing in his speech to his Souldiers, these verses borrowed out of Homer:

Caledonians rebell.

A generall massacre of them by Seuerus.

Nemo manus fugiat vestras, cædemq; cruentam:
Non fœtus, grauidâ Mater quem gestat in aluo,
Horrendam effugiat cædem.
Let none escape your bloudy rage; with terrour let all die:
Spare not the mother nor the child that in her wombe doth lie.

(12) This which seemeth to haue been the worke of Seuerus second yeer in Britaine, Anno two hundred and twelue (for so it is expressed vpon the monies of himselfe and sonnes) may (and with a fit & easie inference from the same authority) seeme to haue beene here the fortune and effect of two encounters & Conquests that same yeere: for whether we obserue the two seuerall coynes of victory then minted, on one of which is the Statue of that armed & winged Goddesse, at whose feet are two Captains prostrate bound; or the other bearing on it a double figure of that lady, grauing the sculpture of the former, mer VICT. BRIT. vpon a Shield, it can conclude no leſſe in probability.

(13) Seuerus remaining in Yorke, where the Legion called Victrix kept, (which place afterwards grew to be one of the chiefeſt for account among the Brigantes, as commonly the Stations of the Romans Colonies were the ſeed-plots of all our Cities, and principall Townes) grew feeble and ſicke, being weakened with age, and wearied with trauell, his malady more increaſing by the diſturbances of the Enemy, and the daily diſloialty of Baſſianus his ſonne, inſomuch that deſpairing of life, hee called his Councell and Captaines before him, and vnderlayd with pillowes, hee thus addreſſed his ſpeech.

Seuerus his ſpeech to his Councell and Captaines.

"(14) Eighteene yeeres almoſt haue "I weilded the affaires of the Empire, and "borne on my ſhoulders the burden of "her encombred eſtate, both at home "and abroad; at my firſt entrance, trou- "bled euery where, now at length quiet, "euen here in Britaine, the moſt vnquiet "and moleſtious Prouince of all: The "profit of which trauels I muſt now "leaue for others to enioy, and with eaſe "in peace to keepe that which I with "care and warre haue gotten. If therfore "amity & mutuall concord be imbraced "(the only ſinewes of a Common-wealth) "the glory of the Empire ſhall yet ſhine "more bright, ſith by concord wee ſee "that ſmall things grow to greatneſſe; "whereas contrariwiſe, diſcord is the "ruine of all. I die & muſt leaue the ſuc- "ceſſe of all to my Succeſſors and "Sonnes by Nature, though the Elder "vnnaturall: I meane Baſſianus new made "Antoninus and your Emperor, who often "ere this hath ſought to gaine that title "by his ſword & my death; but knoweth "not the dangers that attend a Diadem, "neither remembreth that high places "are continually garded with Enuy and "Feares. But ſo blind is Ambition, as it "ſeeth not that a Soueraignes greatneſſe "is ſuch vnto others, but leaſt in him- "ſelfe, and that the things poſſeſſed are "not the very things they ſeemed: It is "not theſe Titles therefore can make "man happy, the line of his life being "drawne forth with ſo many vncertain- "ties, and the height of his power laid "vpon ſo weake foundation. My ſelfe "at this inſtant may ſerue for example, "of whom this may be ſayd, I was all "things, yet nothing, ſeeing I muſt pay my "debt to Nature, and leaue my exployts "in Eaſt and Weſt to bee regiſtred (either "at your diſpoſall) for matters of mo- "ment, and good of the Empire, or blot- "ted to the reproach of my gouernment "with the ſhadowing pencile of Obli- "uion. That therefore my care for the "welfare of this State may ſuruiue my "ſelfe, and bring forth the happy fruits "thereof when I am withered, this ſhall "be my laſt and onely requeſt, that you "will euer aſſiſt my ſonnes, both with "your counſell and ayde, whereby they "may rule according to Law, and you "obey according to Right, that ſo in "you both, the good of the Empire be a- "boue all things reſpected. With which "words hee ended both his ſpeech and "his life.

Spartianus.

(15) This Emperour by Hiſtorians is rancked with the beſt, both for his warres, wherein hee was very fortunate, & for his wiſedome in gouerning the Empire: & yet he is taxed very ſharply both by Sabellicus for ſundry vices, & by Euſebius for ſtirring vp the fifth Perſecution of the Chriſtians in the tenth yeere of his Raigne. In which Irenæus the learned writer, among many others, ſuffred Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, he became more milde to them, as ſayth Saint Ierome; as alſo that he was a diligent reader of the excellent workes of Tertullian, whom vſually he termed his Maſter.

(16) This Emperour was by birth an African, to which Country his affection & graces were ſo much, that the illuſtrious City of thoſe parts, recorded vpon their coyne his many fauours by this Inſcription, INDVLGENTIA AVG. IN CARTH. and ſhrined him amongſt the gods of that Nation. He was the ſon of Geta, his mother Pia Fuluia: himſelfe rough, cruell, couetous, and ambitious, and his nature reliſhing too much of the Punick craft and ſimulation: otherwiſe a moſt expert Souldier, and a worthy Prince, more battels he fought, & more victories obtained, then any other that euer had ruled before him the Romane Empire. In a word, of vertues and vices ſo equally compoſed, that laſtly this grew into a cuſtomed ſpeech: It had been good that this Emperour had neuer beene borne, or being Emperour, that he had neuer died.

Beda.

(17) Of ſtature he was tall, and of a comely perſonage, his countenance ſeuere & repreſenting Majeſty, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head he wore vſually curled. Hee was very learned in the Mathematicks, a good Philoſopher losopher, an eloqueut Orator, and of a deepe sounding voyce. Hee raigned eighteene yeers (layth Eusebius) by Dion Cassius, Herodian, and Eutropius, seuenteene yeers, eight moneths, and odde dayes. He dyed in Yorke, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Christ two hundred and twelue, not so much of sicknes, as of discontent and greefe (or if our British writers may be credited) of a deadly wound gluen by Fulgence, Captaine of the Picts, who, as the Monke of Chester sayth, was brother to Martia, the first wife of Seuerus and mother of Bassianus. His second wife was Iulia Domna the mother of Geta, (though some thinke that she was mother to both) a woman of a surpassing beauty, and an earnest instigator of the two Brethrens reconciliation, had shee not bin blemished with other vices, as after we shall heare.

CHAPTER XXIIII.

Bassianus Caracalla.

Septimius Geta

An. D. 212.

BAssianus Caracalla, and his Brother Septimius Geta, together were declared Emperors by old Seuerus in his life time and both of them them by their father surnamed Antoninus, a man very gracious in the esteeme of the Romans; the elder so stiled about the yeere of Saluation two hundred and fiue, and the yonger foure yeeres after, (as it appeareth by the mintage of their moneys,) were approued & applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted & acknowledged for Emperors. Bassianus the Elder, stiling himselfe Britannicus Maximus, as it should seeme, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperor at York, at his residing there, to quiet Northern Britains; wherein also he gaue him the name Antoninus; for so implyeth that famous law, bearing iointly the names of Seuerus & Antoninus, enacted by them at Yorke, touching the interest and right that masters haue to the goods & possessiõs of their seruants. His mother, the first wife of Seuerus, was Martia a British Lady (say our British Historians, though Sabellicus doth iudge her to be an African) & himself better beloued of the Britains for her sake, then for his owne.

Cod. l. 3. Tit. de rei vindicatione, lege 1.

Gef. Monmouth Sabellicus.

Geta was the sonne of the Empresse Iulia, a second wife, a woman of passing beauty, and surpassing lust, who being perſwaded (by ſome Oracle or dreame) that her husbands ſucceſſour ſhould be an Antoninus, leſt her ſonne ſhould looſe his hope of the Empire, ſhee importuned Seuerus to beſtow the name of Antoninus alſo on Geta; who with it gaue him likewiſe the title of Cæſar, about the yeere two hundred and two. And to vnite the affectiõs of his two ſons, aſwel as to eterniſe their memories he minted their features vpon one Medall, inſcribing the one ſide ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA, CAES. PONT. hauing the yeere before matched them together vpon the reuerſe of his owne money, and incirculing their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPERI. as if the ſeparation of their affections were the diſſolution of his and the worlds Empire.

Some ſay it was Seuerus his dreame. Sabellicus.

Herodian. Sabellicus.

(2) Vpon Seuerus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, haſtning for Rome, proffered good conditions of peace to the Britaines, who long tired with warres, accepted thereof, and hoſtages were giuen for conſeruing the ſame. Wherupon the Empreſſe Iulia accompanied with both the Cæſars, departed hence, carying with them the funerall aſhes of the deceaſed Emperor in a golden Vrna to Rome, where they ſolemnly conſecrated him a God: the ceremony whereof, (becauſe it concerneth ſo great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not vnworthy the inſerting.

In the Porch of his Palace was a bedſteed all of Iuory, dreſſed with richeſt beddi ng and furniture of gold, wherein was laid his Image portraited to the life, but yet in manner of a ſicke man. On the left ſide ſate all the Senators and Princes in blacke mourning weedes; on the right, all the great Ladyes cladde in white, (which then was the mourning colour of that Sexe.) The Phyſitians diligently comming to viſit him, and feeling his pulſe, as if he were aliue, doe ſignifie that his diſeaſe did ſtill increaſe vpon him. This they all did ſeuen dayes together: at laſt, as if then he were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carry him in his Iuory Bed to the * Forum, where all the Patrician youth, and Noble Virgins incompaſſed him with moſt dolefull Hymnes & ruefull ditties. Thence again he was remoued to Mars his field, where was erected a four-ſquare frame of Timber, of a huge height and compaſſe, the ſtoryes ſtill mounting to the top with ſundry aſcents, richly beautified with ſtrange varieties of golde and purple ornaments, and Images of great Art and price: On the ſecond of which aſcents, was placed the Emperours ſayd Bed and Statue, with infinite ſtore of ſweeteſt odours, brought thither from all parts of the City: which done, the yong Nobles brauely mounted on Horſeback, rid round about in a kinde of dance or meaſure, and another ſort likewiſe (who repreſented great Princes) in their coaches; wherupon his ſucceſſor in the Empire, firſt let fire to the frame, then forthwith al the people did the like on al ſides: & when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle ſecretly incloſed within was let flie out of the toppe; which ſoaring a great height, and out of ſight, the people followed it with ſhouts and prayers, ſuppoſing that therewith the Emperours ſoule was carried vp to heauen. And thus Seuerus, which before was a man of Gods making, was now become a god of mans making: & the more to preſerue the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he inſtiled Seuerus his Porch, wherin with moſt exquiſite Art, and admired workemanſhip, were portrayted all his Fathers warres and tryumphs, atchieued here in Britaine or elſe-where.

Forum was the chiefe place of publike meetings and pleadings

Sabellicus.

(3) But preſently after, theſe two vngodly ſons of this new ſuppoſed god, ſo much emulated each others glory, that the deadly ſparkes of enuy blowne a long time with the bellowes of their ambitious deſires, brake out into the flames of murder and bloud, being brethren by one father, but not by the ſame mother (as it is ſayd:) and in this onely like, that they were both ſtarke naught, though both in contrary kindes of Vices. And albeit the Empreſſe Iulia had ſought by all meanes to make peace betwixt them, both formerly here in Britaine, and now, after their returne to Rome: yet the deſire of a ſole Soueraignty, had been a long time ſo rooted in Baſſianus his heart (for which hee had twice attempted his Fathers life, & ſo much haſted his death, that he ſlew his Phyſitians becauſe they had diſpatched him no ſooner) could not endure an equall (much leſſe a confronter) in authority, and therefore in Court and in the armes of the Empreſſe, he ſlew her ſonne Geta, in a time leaſt ſuſpected, whē he had ſate with him in ſtate and diſdaine, the terme of one yeer and twenty two daies.

Geta ſlaine in his mothers armes.

Herodian.

(4) And to cloak this fratricide with ſhew of conſtraint, firſt to the Souldiers, and and then in the Senate, hee accuſeth his brother to haue ſought his death, and that in defence of himſelfe he was forced to ſlay the other, & thereupon fled to the Pretorian Cohorts for ſafety of his life, as though further conſpiracies had been intended againſt him in the City; where at his return he commanded Papinianus the famous Ciuilian, to excuſe the murther in his Pleas at the Barre: which when he refuſed, he cauſed him to be ſlain, as alſo all thoſe that had bin acquainted with Geta; wherby ſo many of the Nobility periſhed, that therby he was accoũted another Nero in Rome: & by his fauorits, the name of Geta was racedout of al monuments & Imperiall inſcriptions, as we haue ſeene ſome of them defaced vpon ſome Altar ſtones found here in Britaine.

Dio Spartianus

Papinianus ſlaine for refuſing to defend a murther.

(5) Of nature he was ſubtile, and could well diſſemble with them whom he feared, & make ſhew of loue where he deadly hated; alwayes fitting himſelfe to the humours of flatteries: Among the Germans, hewould counterfeit their gate and garments; In Greece, be like Alexander, bearing his necke ſomewhat awry; In Troy, would reſemble Achilles; alwaies ſo Camelião-like, as the Romans his (followers) were therewith aſhamed. In a word, Caracalla ſaith Dio, neuer thought of doing good, becauſe as himſelf cõfeſſed, he neuer knew ãy goodnes

Dio.

(6) And to fill vp the meaſure of all iniquity, as one regardleſſe of humanity, or ſhame, hee married Iulia his mother in law, late wife to his owne father (a ſinne (ſayth S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentiles) and by Sext. Aur. Eutrop. and Spar. reported vpon this occaſion. It fortuned that Iulia in preſence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpoſe rather, let fall the vaile which ſhe wore, diſcouering therby her naked breaſts & beauty, which was great; wherat the Emperor caſting his laſciuious eie & bewraying his affection, preſẽtly ſaid, Were it not vnlawfull, I ſhould not be vnwilling: to whõ ſhe replied (without reſpect of modeſty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was ſubiect himſelfe to none: forgetting at once both the murther committed vpon Geta her ſon, & the ſcandals that accompanied ſo foule a ſinne, the pleaſure whereof they did not long enioy, both their deaths (by Gods vengeance) ſoone after enſuing.

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Meſopotamia, & carrying (as it ſeemeth) a guilty conſcience, & ſuſpition of his life, ſent to Maternus, whom he had left Gouernour of Rome, to aſſemble all the Aſtrologers & Mathematicians (vnto which learned impoſters he alwayes gaue eſpeciall credit) and of them to enquire how long he ſhould liue, & by what death he ſhould dye. Maternus hauing ſo done, wrote for anſwer, that Macrinus his Preſect of the Pretorium (then with him in his expeditiõs) went about to murther him. Which is thought rather in enuy of Macrinus to haue beene fained, then by any Aſtrologicall directions ſo giuen forth. This letter & others comming to Caracalla his hand, at ſuch time as he was buſie about his diſport, he deliuered them to Macrinus to reade, & giue him the report at his return. In peruſall wherof finding himſelfe to be accuſed of Treaſon, & fearing leſt by the ſequell he might be brought into greater danger, he incenſed one Martial a Centurion (whoſe brother the Emperour had lately ſlaine) to murther him; which was ſoone performed, and occaſion in the fields offered: for Caracalla ſtepping aſide from his traine to eaſe nature, Martial, as though he had bin called ran haſtily in without hinderance or ſuſpect, and with his dagger ſtabbed him to death; but being too late perceiued, was yet ſo haſtily purſued, that he was hewed to peeces before his tongue could reueale the principall Traitour. Iulia his inceſtuous wife hearing of his death, with poyſon ſlew her ſelfe at Antioch, leauing her ſhame to ſuruiue her life,

(8) Antoninus Caracalla ſayth Euſebius, raigned Emperour ſeuen yeeres and ſix moneths, but Herodian Spartianus and Dio allot him ſix yeers and two moneths: he dyed the eight of April, & yeer of Chriſt two hundred eighteene. The teſtimonies of theſe many Writers notwithſtanding, together with the place & circumſtances of his death, and the perſon by whom it was committed, the Britiſh Hiſtorians do contradict, reporting him to be ſlaine in Britaine, in Battell againſt the Picts, by one Carauceus a man of a low & obſcure birth. But by this it may ſeeme, ſome wounds receiued by him in thoſe Britiſh warres, gaue occaſion to that errour. He left a ſonne not by his inceſtuous mother, nor by Glantilla his wife, whom he exiled into Sicilia; but by a miſtris, whoſe name was Iulia Simiamira his coſen German, and indeede no better then a common ſtrumpet: which corrupt roots brought forth as bitter fruits, euen Heliogabalus, of whom hereafter we ſhall haue occaſion to write.

OPILIVS MACRINVS.

CHAPTER XXV.

Opilius Macrinus.

Diadumenus.

An.D.218. IN prosecuting our intended course, for setting down the Acts and Liues of sundry Emperors hereafter succeeding, I know I shall hardly satisfy my Readers, being no way able to giue content to my selfe, in that on the one side, finding very few remembrances concerning the state of this our Iland, till the raigne of Diocleſian, the History of that Interim may seem impertinent to our purpose; and yet on the other side, considering how vnfit it is, that the Succession of all our Britiſh Monarks should bee interrupted (that Royall Title being likewise annexed to those other Emperours) I suppose it wil be expected, that somwhat also bee sayd of them, though managing their affaires in places farre remote. It seemeth that the continuall striuing for the Imperiall Diademe, and their neerer hazards at home, made them contented to giue Britaine some peaceable breathing, and so deriue vs of the Romane Records of those times: which want if I should supply out of our home-bred Britiſh Writers, I might bee thought, not so much to repaire the ruines of our Monuments, as to heap more rubbish vpon them. And therfore (necessity so enforcing) I must craue patience, if I proceede to the rest of our Countries Monarkes, though I cannot to the residue of our Countries Exploits and Affaires in those dayes.

(2) Opilius Macrinus from obscure and base Parentage, by fauour of the Emperour, without any notable desert in himselfe, first aspired to the office of a Prefect, and at last by the election of the Souldiers, to the Dignity Imperiall. So farre from suspicion of Caracallaes death, by the outward appearance of a seeming sorrow, that he was held of all most free from the Treason, and the second person worthy of their voyce. For first, the Title was conferred vpon aged Audentius, a man of good sort, much experience, and an excellent Captain; whose wisedome could not be drawn to aduenture his life vnder the weight of so vneasie and dangerous a Crowne, but excusing himselfe by the priuiledge of his age, as far vnfit to weild the troubles (much lesse to increase the glory) of the Empire, refused their offers, but with returne of as many thanks as they had giuen him hands or voyces. Whereupon they againe consulted and determined for Macrinus, which as willingly receiued, as Audentius refused: vnto whom they swore fealtie, but not long after failed in performance. An.D.218.

Audentius refuseth the Empire.

(3) He made for his Cæsar, Diadumenus his sonne, changing his name (a vsuall custome at their election) into Antoninus, because that name was gracious among the Romans. The Senate at home confirmed all that the Army had done abroad abroad, vnto whom it seemed their right, as it were by prescription, to haue the election of the Emperours.

(4) His first expedition was against Artabanus King of the Parthians, that hasted against the Romans, for wrongs receiued by Caracalla deceased: but after three great and dangerous Battles, came to an attonement, and a peace betwixt them concluded. After this, as free from further troubles, he returned to Antioch in Syria, and there spent his time in Banquets, and other sensuall pleasures, being drenched so farre therein, that the Army began to dislike his Gouernment, and to fauour young Bassianus the sonne of Caracalla, then present at Emesa a City in Phœnicia, which Mæsa his Grandmother by his Mothers side, who there had built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, and therein ordained him a Priest, for which cause he was called Heliogabalus, that is to say in the Phœnician Language, The Priest of the Sunne.

(5) To this Temple in their vaine deuotions resorted many of the Romane Souldiers; and seeing the beauty of the youth, allured Mæsa to bring him to their Campe: where knowne to bee the sonne of Caracalla, the Souldiers proclaimed him Emperour, and maintained his right against Macrinus, who after this reuolt, met young Heliogabalus in the Confines betweene Phœnicia and Syria, where he fought a bloudy Battle, and Macrinus forsaken of all, and driuen to flie; who with his sonne hasting thorow Asia and Bithynia, came lastly to Chalcedon, where he fell sicke, and was there, together with Diadumenus, put to death the seuenth day of Iune, the yeere of Christs Incarnation two hundred & nineteene, when hee had raigned one yeere, one moneth, and xxviii. dayes.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Antoninus Heliogabalus Emp.

An.D. 219.

YOung Bassianus, surnamed Heliogabalus, the sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gaue hopes to his raisers, of many princely parts, and signes of those things that in sequele, by better proofe appeared to be only signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his mind been answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was ouer-prodigall and lauish in his outward forme, so was the other as sparing and defectiue in bestowing of her inward gifts: insomuch that both in mind and garment, hee seemed to be that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reuerse of his money, tooke it no meane addition of honor to his Imperiall Dignity, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sunne; which in the Assyrian tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal,

(2) Assoone as he had setled the Empire firme vpon himselfe, by the death of Macrinus, hee began to discouer his owne dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparell, lightnesse, and dyet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre differed from the manners of men, that modesty will not suffer vs to record his greatest vices, Heliogabalus exceedeth in wickednes all others before him.

(3) His apparell was rich, and most extreme costly, and yet would he neuer weare one garment twice: his Shooes embellished with Pearles and Diamonds; his Seats strewed with Muske and Amber; his Bed couered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Iewels; his Way strewed with the Powder of Gold & Siluer: his Vessels (euen of basest vse) all Gold; his Lamps burning with no other Oyle then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Rōses; his Ships (in his Naumachies or Ship-fights) floted in a Riuer of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once vsed, presently pluckt downe; his Plate of fineſt Gold, but neuer serued twice to his Table, his Rings and Iewels most rich, yet neuer worne twice; his Concubines many and chargeable, but not one laine with twice, his Diet so profuse, that at euery supper in his Court, was vsually spent a Thousand Pound Sterling: inuiting the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, he strewed all the Roomes with Saffron, as it were with Rushes, saying, That such Cattle were worthy of such costly Litter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eatē, in the Land no Flesh: whole Meales made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Braines of most costly creatures, alwayes saying, That meat was not sauoury, whose sauce was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the reuenewes of Germany, France, Britaine. Spaine, Italy, Sicilia, Græcia, Asia, Syria, Aegypt, Arabia. and all the Ilands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresse, six hundred Chariots followed him laden with Strumpets, Boyes, and Bauds, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Harlot, made to them solemne and set Orations, terming them therin his Fellow-Souldiers, & Companions in Armes, with Instructions for them how to practise with most variety their filthy Luxuries. In regard of which kinde of actions, one doth make this doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigality, his stupendious Lechery, or his foppish Foolery: the last of which his Imperiall vertues, he gaue proofe of, when he gathered in the City ten thousand waight of Spiders, professing that thereby he vnderstood how great a City Rome was: at another time ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Wezels, which he brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purpose like the former.

Aelius Lampri.

Herodian.

(5) In Rome he built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, (like to that in Phœnicia, whereof himselfe was Priest,) commanding the Christians therin to worship: as also a Charter-house for women to meet & determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate-house his mother Semiamira, allowing her a voice among the Senators. In modesty I forbeare to write the particulars of his vn-manly libidinous filthinesse, adding only that which a judicious Author speakes of him: Kings (sayth he) as they haue greater power to sinne then other men, so haue they lesser safety in sinning then any man; for being set aboue others in the eye of the World, they are as Markes that are aymed at, and lye open to the shot of Reuenge. And so was the state of this Superlatiue Monster, whose owne Conscience still stung him, euen in the midst of his sweetest sinnes; and therfore euer expecting some violent end, he prepared silken halters, richly wrought to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Knives to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of inualuable cost, that thence he might cast himselfe headlong, hauing these words oft in his mouth, That howeuer he dyed his death should be precious in the eyes of all men. But he fayled of his hope, though not of his desert; for against him the Prætorian Souldiers suddenly arose, no wrong offred them, more then vnto others, but out of a Iustice in God, who repayeth sinne with sinne, and suffereth not such outragious wicked ones to escape vnreuenged.

(6) These breaking into his Palace, found him not in estate answerable to his calling, but hidde (for feare) in a homely place sutable with his dirty conditions: from whence with Acclamations thorow the streets of Rome, more like a Dogge then a Man, they dragged him with his mother, saying, The Bitch and her whelpes must go together: & after their fury spent threw their bodyes into the cōmon sinke of the City, and thence into Tyber, sinking them downe with great stones, lest the carcases cast vp with the waues, should either find buriall, or infect the ayre. The Senate approuing all that was done, decreed that his name should bee obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and neuer any Antoninus (a name before very gracious) should rule againe their Empire: so odious was the remembrance of this Image of Ignominy.

A Priuy. Sabellicus.

(7) He was aged but fourteene yeers, when he became Emperour; by Herodians computation, he raigned six yeeres, and dyed at twenty: By Aurelius Victors he dyed at seuenteene, and raigned not fully three yeeres: Eusebius sayth, that he raigned fully foure: Omphrius would haue him to liue eighteen yeers, and to dye the 8 day of March, anno two hundred twenty three.

ALEX-

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Alexander Seuerus Emp.

An. D. 223.

BEfore the death of Heliogabalus, his Cosin German Alexianus, by the working of his mother Mămea, was made his Cæsar; whose vertues dayly increasing with his age, gaue hopes to the better sort of some happier times by his meanes: but so farre incensed Heliogabalus (who hated nothing more then vertue) and so dimmed his fame, that hee often assayed to take away his life by trechery: But suruiuing him whom no man wished to liue, he was with publicke blessings, and vnspeakeable joy elected Emperour, his name they changed from Alexianus to Alexander, and his surname giuen of old Seuerus.

Lampridius sayth he was borne on the day that Alexander the great died, and therefore had his name. Sabellicus.

(2) He was the sonne of one Varius, a Syrian borne, and of Mammea, sister to Semiamira, though there are who say, that both the sisters attending on their Aunt Iulia the Empresse, were gotten with child by young Caracalla, and so he father of Alexianus: howsoeuer he was brought vp in learning from his childhood, hauing a naturall propension to all humane vertues and diuine pieties: He was very skilfull in the Mathematicks, Geometry, Musicke, Caruing, and Painting, and composed some Bookes also of Poetry: so great a louer of the liberall Arts, that he allowed the professors thereof annuall stipends for their further encouragement: and that which most is, hee much fauoured the Christians, from whom he tooke to himselfe examples of life, and vrged their Precepts vnto others, and this one especially * NOT TO DOE TO OTHERS VVHAT VVE VVOVLD NOT HAVE DONE TO VS. Their Christ he honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would haue had him consecrated among the Romane Gods: Vnto whom hee also was minded to haue built a Temple, had not his Idol-Priests hindred the same: but a place of their holy assemblies he allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certain Vinteners or Victuallers laid claime to the place whereunto the Christians resorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therein should be worshipped, then belly-gods should be pampered to surfet there. (A good document of a Heathen for some Christians, who turne places consecrate to Gods diuine seruice into Sheep-Cotes, or to the like prophane vses.) This good inclination of Alexander the sonne, was vndoubtedly stirred vp by the instigations of Mammea his mother, who as Eusebius witnesseth, had sent for Origen (the Christian Doctour) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom she was so well instructed, that Ierome giues her the honourable Title of a most holy Woman.

Herodian.

Sabellicus.

Lampridius the truest relator of this Emperours acts (for Herodian speakes on spleene) sayth he caused this Christian Poesie to bewritten all about his Palace, & sometimes commanded by voice of a publike Crier Lampridius. Sabellicus.

Alexander Seuerus incited to Christianity by his mother Mammea. Euseb Eccles. hist. l. 6. c. 20. Hierome.

(3) Himselfe, though young, ruled the Empire with great wisedome and Iustice: admitting onely such for his Counsellors as were men vncorrupt, sage and learned, skilfull in the Ciuill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office or charge by suite, but only by the commendation of each mans worth and fitnes for the place: In regard whereof, he caused Turinus (one of his Courtiers, which tooke money of diuers, with promise miſe to procure the Emperours fauour in their ſuites) to be put to death by ſmoak, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had ſold ſmoake, and therefore with ſmoake he ſhould die. And likewiſe to cut off, in Lawyers their continuall ſelling of Iuſtice (the bane of all Common wealths) for a fee, hee granted a publike and ſet reward to ſuch as ſhould pleade gratis. By which courſes, his ciuill affaires were nobly managed, and his warres likewiſe proued as proſperous: for he tryumphed with great glory ouer the Parthians: The Germans alſo, who in furious manner had paſſed the Riuers Danuby and the Rhine, in many skirmiſhes hee put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Bountifull and liberall hee was both to the people and ſouldiers, as by the reuerſe of his coine aboue prefixed is ſeen, wherein is expreſſed the fourth Donatium and Congiarium, beſtowed by the bounty of this Emperour vpon the Souldiers and common people, of which Lampridius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Enuy euer attends perſons of Eſtate, and a deſire of change, breeds a diſlike of the preſent, ſo the Roman Legions growne farre out of order by the prodigious Gouernment of the laſt Emperour, proued now vnnaturall to their dread Soueraigne: whoſe warres drawing him into Germany, and thence hither into Britaine, he found ſome of his Souldiers here ſo tumultuous, that he though fit to vſe exemplary ſeuerity towards them; whereupon they being ſecretly backt, (as is ſuppoſed) by Maximinus (a potent man in the army, rayſed onely by the Emperours fauour) they traiterouſly aſſayled him, and together with his mother Mammea, murthered him in a village then called Scilla, though others ſay he was ſlaine in Germany, in the City Mogunce, and ſome in France, no other cauſe mouing them, but only his vertue; the eight day of March, when he had raigned (by Lampridius) thirteene yeeres and nine dayes, aged by Herodian, and Iulius Capitolinus, twenty nine yeeres, three moneths and ſeuen dayes, the yeere of our Sauiour, two hundred thirty ſix.

CHAPTER. XXVIII.

Maximinus Emperour.

CAIVS. IVLIVS. VERVS. MAXI. CAES.

Maximinus Cæſ

An. D. 236.

MAximinus, a man barbarous by birth and diſpoſition, (himſelfe a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gotland, very obſcure, his mother Ababa of little better ranck) ſpent his youth in keeping of Cattell, the pouerty of his parents admitting no better maintenance: Yet afterwards his fortunes brought him vnto great aduancement, ment, and that by working vpon the outward obiect of his perſon, being for ſhape and ſtrength (if the reporter deſerue credit) rather to be thought a vaſt Gyant, then deſcribed for a goodly man. For Iulius Capitolinus affirmes his height to bee eight foote and a halfe by Geometricall meaſure, and his body anſwerable in euery proportion, inſomuch, as he did weare as a Ring on his thumbe, the * bracelet which his wife vſed to weare on her arme, a ſtature thought vncredible; and yet Ioſephus, an Author of great credit, doth confidently record, that one Eleazer a Iew, accompanied Darius the Kings ſonne of Perſia vnto Rome, (ſent by Vitellius to Tiberius for an hoſtage, whoſe height, as hee ſayth, was fully ſeuen cubits, a meaſure ſurmounting this.

Capitolinus cals it Dextrocherium, being a broad plate of Gold ſet with rich Iewels, an ornament in vſe amongſt the Roman Ladies. Ioſeph. Antiq. l. 18. cap. 6.

(2) This Maximinus increaſing ſtrength with growth, left his trade of Cattle keeping, and reſorted to the Roman Campe then in Syria, where for his admirall height, he was admitted by Septimius Seuerus into the ranke of a common Souldier, and ſhortly after, preferred to be one of his Guard. Baſſianus made him a Coronell, and Heliogabalus gaue him the leading of certaine foot: but the laſt Emperour Alexander aduanced him to be a Captaine of the fourth Legion, whoſe death notwithſtanding he diſloyally practiſed; (of ſuch force is the deſire of Soueraignty which makes men forget all bonds of gratitude and loyall truſt) and was thereupon by the Souldiers elected Emperour, with fealty ſworne vnto him.

Maximinus his meanes of riſing to preferment.

Herodian and Aurelius Victor ſay that this was done Alexander yet liuing Maximinus of a naughty diſpoſition.

(3) The ignoble Vpſtart thus borne from the dunghill vpon the wings of Fortune, vnto the ſeate of Maieſty, thought the increaſe of his pride was an increaſe of State; and knowing hee had nothing for which he might deſerue to be loued, he ſtudied in the whole managing of his eſtate, how by all meanes he might bee feared. Hee therefore diſplaced Senatours, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom not? with murders, baniſhments, and confiſcations of their goods: all ſuch eſpecially hee did cut off, whom he ſuppoſed to haue knowledge of his baſe beginnings. The Chriſtians likewiſe vnder him were martyred, (whereof Origen wrot a Booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the ſixth Perſecutor of Gods Saints: ſo that, whereas his flatterers at firſt called him Milo, Anteus, and Hercules, for his ſtrength; now they all tearmed him, Buſiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his ſauage cruelty.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. li. 6. c. 27. Maximinus, perſecuteth the Chriſtians

His death attempted.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man was often attempted to bee taken away, firſt, by Maximus, a man of a Conſular dignity; then by Quarcinus (whom Capitolinus calleth Ticus) ſet on by the old Souldiers of Septimius Seuerus, that had beene diſgraced by Maximinus; and laſtly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconſul, a very worthy and learned man, of foureſcore yeeres old) Emperour, and his ſonne (of the ſame name and Princely qualities) his Cæſar: the Senate likewiſe confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himſelfe the ſurname Africanus, either in reſpect of his Pro-conſulſhip which hee exerciſed in that Prouince, or elſe as deſcended from Scipio his family who bore that ſurname: His ſonne Gordianus likewiſe was ſtiled Auguſtus, as appeareth by his Coynes, whereon he writeth himſelfe A V G. and vpon the Reuerſe, P I E T A S A V G. Gordianus elected Emperour, and his ſonne elected Cæſar.

Maximinus then in Hungary, and hearing thereof, rather like a mad man raged at his misfortunes, then either by courage or wiſe forecaſt endeuoured to redeeme them.

(5) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Enſignes and glory of an Emperour, entred Carthage, with bleſſings and acclamations of ioy: whereat his old enemy Capelianus, Gouernour of Numidia and Mauritania (Prouinces in Africke) much enuied; and gathering forces in Maximinus his name, made head againſt him, and ſhortly gaue him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was ſlaine before the walles of the City. The father ſeeing his Cæſars diſaſtre, himſelfe an Emperour onely nominall, his new riſen Sunne to haue paſſed the circle of his height, and now to approach to the ſetting and fall, wiſhed wished againe his priuate estate; and in despaire, griefe, and disdaine of his enemies successe, with the Girdle which he wore, strangled himselfe to death, when hee had beene stiled Emperour onely twenty six dayes: wherat Maximinus was not a little ioyfull, and the Senate no lesse perplexed, seeing themselues depriued of their hopes, and now layd open to the Tyrants, who like a a Lyon came ranging on; threatning reuenge in all their blouds.

Gordianus the father strangled.

(6) The State thus standing, all the Peeres and Princes thereof assembled themselues together at Rome: and in the Temple of Iupiter; after long debating of their present dangers concluded, that Maximus Pupienus and Clodius Balbinus together should be Emperours; men of great account and fauour with the people: These taking Oath and Imperiall Robes leuied forces to maintaine their cause, aud Balbinus taking charge of the City, Pupienus marched to meete Maximinus, who in great pride had passed the Alpes, entred Italy, and now layd siege against Aquileia; in which this was very memorable, that The Citizens wiues cut off the haire of their heads, to make bow-strings for resistance of so hatefull a Tyrant: where after long assault preuailing little, his discontented Souldiers fell to mutiny: and entring his Pauilion, at noone day without resistance, slew both him and his sonne, bearing the same name, whom hee had created his Cæsar, and whose moneys, as hee minted them, we haue inserted at the entrance of his Empire. Their heads for a Trophy they sent before them to Rome, where with such acceptations they were receiued, as that the Senate acknowledged themselues to be rid of a Monster.

Maximinus and his sonne slaine.

(7) Hee was, as is sayd, exceedingly tall, his body great and ioynts proportionable, faire of face, full eyes, and of such strength as is vncredible: and according to his limmes, so was his dyet: for hee dayly deuoured forty pound waight of flesh, and thereto drank six Gallons of wine. Hee dyed aged sixty yeeres and odde, when hee had raigned three yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

{PVPIENVS MAXIMVS / CLODIVS BALBINVS} Emperours.

Chapter XXIX.

Pupienus Maximus Emp.

Clodius Balbinus Emp.

An. D. 238.

Vpienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperors, the one in action, and the other resident, a great sedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloudy issue among the Citizens, and Rome it selfe was set on fire in sundry places: the Emperours presence and authority little preuailing:

uailing: which ſtrucke ſuch feare into their hearts that they accounted theſe times moſt vnfortunate, and themſelues and preſent eſtate to be moſt deſperate. But the death of Maximinus (and his head happily brought them at the inſtant) gaue preſent life to their dying hearts. And Pupienus comming to Aquileia, as much quieted the Army; ſent backe the Lieutenants to their places of charge, and with great pompe and prayſe returned to his Fellow Emperour.

(2) The parentage of Balbinus is reported to bee both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome, by great Pompey, and himſelfe borne at Cales in Spaine. Pupienus Auncestors were much latter, yet had he borne many offices of Magiſtracy, and euer diſcharged them with wiſedome and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

Iul. Capitolinus.

(3) Peace thus eſtabliſhed beyond all expectation, with ſhouts and applauſes the Emperours enter the Senate-houſe, where (according to the cuſtome and their deſerts) they were ſtiled The Fathers of the Senate, with thankes as to the onely preſeruers of their liues and eſtates: and ſome extolling the Senate highly for their prouident foreſight, in electing ſuch ſapient and worthy Emperors, contrary to the raſh and vndiſcreet practiſe of ſuch as choſe their gouernours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they aduance them; and whoſe bad liues brought commonly their vntimely, but deſerued deaths. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themſelues to bee taxed with thoſe aſperſions, and the rather, becauſe the German ſtrangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themſelues were not to bee truſted; ſo turning their ſpleene againſt the preſent Emperours, ſought to ſet vp a new, which ſhortly after they found opportunity to effect.

The Emperors enuy one another.

(4) For theſe Emperours, though aged and wiſe, were not ſo linked together in affection, as they were neere ioyned in Authority: and therefore the winde of emulation had the eaſier paſſage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wiſedome and gouernment to bee more iudicious; the other his Birth and Nobility to bee more honourable, and each of them hauing his owne Guard, ſtood vpon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endeuours were well conſorting for the buſineſſe of the Empire.

(5) At this time the Prouinces of Parthia and Germany grew vnquiet, and by Ciuill diſcords, endangered their ſubjections: to repreſſe which, the Emperours agreed to goe in perſon, the one into the Eaſt, the other into Germany. Now whilſt theſe great preparations were in making, the Capitoline-Games were celebrated in Rome, whereunto all (almoſt) reſorted, but eſpecially the new-come Guards of the Emperours, The Pretorians finding the aduantagious time, which they had long waited for, ſuddenly in armour aſſayled the Court; which Pupienus perceiuing, ſent in all haſte for Balbinus, and both their Guards for defence. But his Fellow-Emperour, vpon a vaine ſuſpition detracted time himſelfe, and hindred the forwardneſſe of the Guardes, ſo that theſe Traytours had eaſie acceſſe into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they diſpoyled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled theſe poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two Theeues thorow the middeſt of the City: Laſtly, they ſlew them, and left their bodyes to deſpightfull ignominy.

(6) Theſe Emperours raigned together one yeere and ſomewhat more, and dyed the yeere of Chriſt two hundred thirty nine: In which yeere happened ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, that the noone-day thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTO. GORDIANVS.

CHAPTER XXX.

M: Antoninus Gordianus Emperor.

An. D. 239.

GOrdianus (for Antoninus hee might not be called, a law formerly acted inhibiting the same) was the Sonne of a Daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himselfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleuen yeeres was created Cæsar by the Senate, with Pupienus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteene yeeres of age. Greatly was he strengthned by the Alliance and Counsell of one Misitheus his Prefect and Instructor, whom for his great learning he so honoured and loued, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whose onely direction, he prosperously administred his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Prouinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were imployed in Britaine since Virius Lupus there placed by Seuerus, (since whose death our Storie hath spent twenty seuen yeeres) wee finde not recorded. Yet now in the raigne of young Gordianus, some glimmering light for her Gouernment appeareth by an Altar stone found in Cumberland, at a place then called * Castra exploratorum, with an inscription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third; his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Family: which votiue Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horsemen surnamed Augusta Gordiana; when Æmilius Christinus a natiue of Africa gouerned the same vnder Nonnius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine in the yeere of Christ, two hundred forty three, as appeareth by the Consuls therein specified: whose forme and inscription wee haue followed by the Stone it selfe, now remaining at Connington among many others, in the custody of Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet.

* Old Carlel

IOM.

In his fift yeere, the Parthians vnder the Leading of Sapor their King had paſſed into the confines of the Romane Prouinces, as far as Antioch in Syria, which Citie they had taken, with ſpoile of the Countries adioining: againſt whom, the yong Emperour in warlike manner addreſſed himſelfe, and in perſon prepared to vndergo the warres.

(3) In Rome the Temple of Ianus that long had ſtood ſhut, hee cauſed to be opened, a ſure token that warres were in hand: and departing the City, paſſed the Straits of Helleſpont, and tooke his way thorow Myſia, to ſtay the Gothes that were come downe to inhabite Thracia. Thence marching to Antioch, recouered the Citie, forcing Sapor to forſake the Prouince, and to content himſelfe with his owne demaines.

(4) But long this Sunne went not without a Cloud, nor his fauorable fortunes without a checke; for Miſitheus his Neſtor, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poiſoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counſell, and miſſed for truſt: to ſupply which, Philip (an Arabian and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wise (I must needs say) had hee beene moderate; and valiant in Armes, had hee beene true. But the glory of a Diademe beheld with the false light of ambition, so dimmed the eye of his dutifull affection, and blinded the senses of his aspiring mind, that hee, who from nothing was risen to be something, thought that also nothing worth, whilst it was shadowed with the name of a subiect. First therefore he sought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom he was facile; to regard the poore, to whom hee was liberall; and in all things to outstrippe his Soueraigne, to whom hee was treacherous. Yong Gordianus vnable to endure his Prefectors designes, or his owne disgraces, and perceiuing the marke whereat he aimed, complained his wrongs in open assemblies, and to the Soldiers after this tenor.

Gordianus his speech to the Souldiers.

"(5) I got not this state from my "Parents by birth, nor yet by any de- "serts (I must confesse) in my selfe, being "the least of many that did deserue it "better: but it was you, my fellow Soul- "diers (vpon what fate I know not) that "haue made mee what I am. If then I "haue defrauded your hopes, by carry- "ing my selfe vnder your expectations, I "wish to be set in the place where I first "was; or rather (if I so deserue) my life, "and state, may at one instant be ended "by your vnerring hand: For Noble "mindes cannot brooke to be curbed "with the bitte of base indignities, nor "suffer their vassals to bee Corriuals of "their Maiesty. It is a jealous obiect (I "must needs confesse) and many times "casts great suspition when is smal occa- "sion: but I, for my part, haue alwayes "thought of that humour, that men "causlesly jealous, doe most iustly de- "serue what they vniustly feare; & both "your selues will be my witnesses, how "farre I am from the touch of that "staine; and also the dayly occurents of "my Cæsar, (if so low I may terme him) "doth make morethen manifest. I am but "yong, yet elder by six yeers then I was; "my body tender, yet exposed to the "chance of warre; my counsell raw, yet "bettered by your wisedomes: and my "conquests in my selfe nothing, but yet "in your valors both glorious & famous. "What then are mine errors, that I may "amend them? or your discontents, that "I may redresse them? for by the powers "of heauē I protest, it is your loues which "I most esteeme, & the good of the Em- "pire, for which I onely wish to liue: "the first is in your powers to bestow at "your pleasure, but the other in me (if "it bee possible) shall liue euen after "death.

(6) These complaints notwithstanding, Philip so politickly, nay, rather traiterously, brought his owne proiects to passe, as that the yong innocent Emperour was displaced, and abandoned of all: in which distresse hee first sued to be made his Cæsar, and that denied, to be his Pretorian Prefect: but neither would be had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Captaine, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatnes of Gordianus his bloud, his loue and esteeme both in Rome and the Prouinces, and his owne vertues equalising any, hee commanded him to bee slaine in the twenty two yeere of his age, and the sixt of his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcius, and after him againe, L. Aurel. Seuerus, Ostulianus. But Philip through the giddy multitude preuailed against both. This Emperour though yong, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authority added to his titles TVTOR REIPVBLICÆ, and PARENS PRINCIPVM POPVLI ROMANI; and after his death euen by his owne murtherers his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Persia, and vpon his sepulcher this inscription set.

DIVO GORDIANO VICTORI PERSARVM, VICTORI GOTHORVM, VICTORI SARMATARVM, DEPVLSORI ROMANARVM SEDITIONVM, VICTORI GERMANORVM, SED NON VICTORI PHILIPPORVM.

To the Sacred Gordianus vanquisher of the Persians, Gothes, and Sarmates, extinguisher of the Roman Ciuil discords, and subduer of the Germans, but not of the Philippians.

(7) He was of condition most noble and louely, of behauiour gentle, very studious & giuen much to learning; hauing in his Library no lesse then threescore and two thousand Bookes, as is reported; the truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enioy so vertuous, so clement, so peereles an Emperour. He dyed in the moneth of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty fiue.

Iulius Philip. Emperour.

Iulius Philip. Cæsar

An.D.245.

WHat man is there, who considering those forepast murthers, of so many and so mighty Monarchs, would not by the spectacle of others calamities, bee induced to preferre the security of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soueraignty; whose glorious content is only in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both reall and perpetuall? But of so attractiue vertue is the Load-stone of Maiestie, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawn to that one point of the Compasse; and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them, they will lanch forth with their full sailes into the Mare incognitum, Sea of vnknowne calamities. And amongst others, such were the blinde desires, and such the vnhappy euent of this Iulius Philippus the Arabick Barbarian. Of parentage obscure aud ignoble, as Victor, and others affirm, who pluckt off the imperial robes of his Liege-Lord, to inuest himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feare of his Parthian Soldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon shuffling vp a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his sonne Philip for his Cæsar, (whose Coynes with his, we haue set in the beginning of this Chap.) he made all speede towards Rome: where the yeere insuing, his shewes & games were exceedingly magnificent, for the Celebration of the Birth-day (as we may terme it) of Rome, that being, the thousandth yeere from her foundation.

(3) It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a sense of his owne forepast sinnes, and also with the light of heauenly truth, that hee hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptized into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip,

The meanes of his conuersion from Idolatry, were Fabianus, and Origen, who by letters exhorted him thereunto: and for the same Profession, were both himselfe and sonne murdered, by Decius his Captaine, though others report, that Decius did rather hate Christianity for their sakes, then them for their Professions sake. And howsoeuer Pomponius Lætus accuseth him to bee a dissembling Prince, yet Eusebius declareth the effects of his Profession farre otherwise: for Philip (sayth hee) seeking to communicate with the Saints, could not be admitted till such time as he had made open confession of his Faith; at which time he joyned himselfe with those, who for their sinnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the roome of the Penitents, because that in many things he had been faulty: which willingly he obeyed, and declared by his workes his sincere and religious mind towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellicus and Bergomensis, who shew, that the hatred of Decius against Philip and his sonne was conceiued, for that they had committed the custody of their Treasures vnto Fabianus the Christian Bishop of Rome, who baptized them as some write; though others say, Ponius the Martyr did it.

(5) Into whose Charge was sent Decius, a man of great experience, who also no sooner was in the Army, but they forced the Imperiall Ensignes vpon him, and (as some report) against his will: hee therefore sent secretly to Philip, declaring this attempt of the Souldiers, and how he meant to make escape from them with persisting in his dutifull allegeance. But the Emperour fearing this to be but policy in Decius, lest by delay he might giue him more strength, omitted no time to vphold his owne, and with a mighty Army vndertooke these armes himselfe, not trusting any more to the disposall of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a sterne resolution, and ouer-hard hand, held the reine of that begun Expedition, whereby hee presently lost the loue of the Army, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, & cut off Philips head thorow the teeth, before they had departed Italy. At newes whereof, the Pretorians slew Philip his Cæsar and sonne, a man of so obseruable composednesse, as that he had bin neuer seene to laugh in all his life. And thus the two Philips ended their raignes.

C. VIBIVS TREBONIANVS GALLVS, CAIVS VIBIVS VOLVSIANVS, Emperours.

Chapter XXXIII.

Trebo. Gallus Emperour.

Vibius Volus. Emp.

An. D. 252.

THis ouerthrow of the Romanes, and death of Decius, in outward semblance was so greeuously taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was so forward for reuenge as hee, and therefore the last in suspition of Treason. The Army hee strengthened, and daily encouraged, pretending great seruice against those barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby hee soone atchieued his desire, and with their applauses was proclaimed Emperour.

Gallus elected Emperour.

(2) By Birth, he was descended of an honourable Family in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery & falshood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Gouernour of Mysia, and to keepe the passages from the inuading Gothes, the desire of Rule so corrupted his mind, that he plotted with them against the Army, and betraied the trust and life of his Soueraigne.

(4) Gallus little regarding theſe troubles abroad, conſumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Bondman to his owne voluptuous deſires, then a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and Fellow-Emperour, his ſonne Voluſianus as appeareth by inſcription of Coyne placed before; a very childe, whoſe yeeres did quit him of any Capitall Crime. (5) For the Gothes continuing their furies begunne; his Generall Aemilian Maurus ouerthrew them with a wonderfull ſlaughter; whereby he grew ſo famous, and Gallus ſo contemptible, that the Souldiers (euer affecting change) proclaimed him Emperour, the newes whereof ſoone rouſed Gallus from the Bed of his laſciuious pleaſures, and with his ſonne entred the quarrell againſt Aemilianus, whoſe fortune was to ſlay them both in fight, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after he had raigned not fully two yeers, and liued (as Victor teſtifieth) forty and ſeuen: whereupon the Armies ioyning their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title & Enſignes vpon the Conqueror.

(2) His Election at firſt was contradicted by the Italian Bands, in fauour of Valerianus their owne Leader, whom they ſought to raiſe Emperour, the Senate alſo inclining thereto, the fame of the man among them was ſo renowned. The moſt voyces therefore were heard on his ſide. Some haue rather accounted Æmilianus an Vſurper, then rancked him in the catalogue of lawful Emperors.

(3) But

Eutropius.

(3) But seeing Eutropius doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claime; only his short time of gouernment admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the budde, before the graft had time to spring. For his Army disliking what themselues had done, and hearing of the worths and election of Valerianus, laid down their weapons borne in his defence, and tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their blouds, after hee had raigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure moneths.

Aemil Maurus his end and continuance of his raigne.

(4) So vnconstant is the state of worldly felicity, and may be compared to a masterlesse Shippe, which without Tackle is left to the mercy of the raging Seas, that is one while carried with the faire windes of hope towards the hauen of wished desires, but straightwaies ouerwhelmed with the waues of despaire: and most especially him that is borne vpon the opinions of the giddy multitude, now carried aloft vpon the flouds of their fawning fauors, and anon left in the sands of their retyring ebbes, with a sudden shipwracke of all their fore-gone fortunes. And these aduentures too soone Aemilianus felt, who the same yeer that hee thus put foorth to Sea, lost all his aduenture, and therewith also his life, Anno 253.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An. D. 254.

IF euer the saying of the wise Athenian Solon (spoken to Crœsus the rich King of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truly may it be verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperour: whose yeers were multiplyed with increase of honour, vntil they came to seuenty and seuen, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had neuer hapned to any Romane Emperor before him, and (I may wel say) to no other Monarch in the world before liuing: such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghill to raise men of low degree, and to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Maiesty; then againe to bring down the Mighty from their Seate of glory, and to leaue them chained with the poorest captiues, and basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great & Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Majesty fell into the conditions of an vnreasonable Beast; and so it was with Valerianus, though not vtterly abandoned from the Society of men, as Babels king was: yet was he caried Captiue vnto a nation whose Society was scarce humane, and where his vsage was more then barbarous.

Valerianus his descent.

(2) This man was both nobly descended, and of so great esteeme among the Romans, that being but a priuate man, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censor, an Office of high dignity, conferred euer vpon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his Life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to haue beene gracious and and milde towards the Christians, aboue any of his Ancestors whatsoeuer: yea euen those who were themselues openly accounted Christians: insomuch, that his Clemency was their Protection, and his Court the Sanctuary of their safeties. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred vp an Ægyptian Sorcerer against them, who so inchanted the Emperours heart, that with great cruelty hee began the Eighth Persecution, and so raged that some haue appropriated the sayings otf the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter vnto him, as to whom power was giuen for two and forty moneths ouer the Saints of God, and a mouth to vtter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horrible tortures to die, and more had done, if the iust reuenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapor the sauage King of Persia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage; where striking Battell with him, was left (either by Treason or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken Prisoner by the Persians; hauing then raigned seuen yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the bloud of Saints) and thence forward the rest of his life was inthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse seruitude: For the Tyrannizing Persian puft vp with this fortunate gale, to an excessiue swelling of pride; whensoeuer hee was disposed to take Horse, made Valerianus his Foot-stoole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World, to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his necke and backe for himselfe thereon to tread, and mount vnto his Saddle: In which vnsufferable slauery, his old body indured without release, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authours account was full seuen yeers more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

(4) But herein the misery of Valerianus, is much greater then Nabuchadnezzars was, in that God both restored him to his former glory, and indued him with heauenly grace to confesse his sinnes; whereas Valerianus perished in the disperate calamity whereinto he was fallen; as Eusebius sheweth in these words: And thou Valerian, forasmuch as thou hast exercised the same cruelty in murdering the subiects of God, therefore hast proued vnto vs the righteous Iudgement of God, in that thy selfe wast bound in Chaines, and carried away for a Captiue Slaue with thy glorious Purple and thy Imperiall Attire and at length also commanded by Sapor King of the Persians, to be slaine, & powdred with salt, hast set vp vnto all men a perpetuall Monument of thine owne wretchednesse.

Eusebius in sermone ad concentum Sanctorum.

(5) How vnspeakeable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperour endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not onely those which were Allies to the Romane Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapores were moued with commiseration, and distaste, as Trebell. Pollio proueth by the copy of one he produceth from King Belsolus, as followeth.

"Belsolus King of Kings to King Sapor "greeting. If I were assured that the "brightnesse of the Romans might bee "dimmed, or their Emperiall greatnesse "were at the ebbe of their fall, I would "with thee reioyce for thy present for"tunes, which in thine own conceit are "glorious to thee, and beneficiall to "vs all thy fellow Princes: but take "heed thy pride deceiue thee not, that "thou bee not a hurt to thy Successors, "and vnto vs all; for one Ship drowned "by tempest doth not minister destru"ction to the whole Fleete, nor one "ouerthrowne assure a full Conquest. "But rather consider how many Na"tions of enemyes, the Romans haue "made vassals to their Empire. The "Gaules wee know haue sacked Italy "it selfe, and haue set the city of Rome "on fire, but now we see them a seruile "nation, and themselues made subiect "to the Romans; The Africans likewise "ere this haue giuen them many ouer"throwes, yet at this day the dice is "cast, and the Africans chance is, to "serue the Romanes. To let passe "more ancient and remote examples, "Mithridates King of Pontus, and Lord "of all Asia, far mightyer then thou, "was by the Romans ouerthrowne, and "Asia made a province vnto their sub"iection. They haue lost, thou wilt "say; but what? a weake old man "though an Emperour: their strengths "little lessened, hauing choice sufficient both of election and reuenge. "Thou hast won, but how? by valour? "Nothing lesse; but by treachery, and "that also by thine enemies assistance: "yet

"yet herein assure thy selfe, that their "fidelity to theeward is of no firmer "assurance. Follow then my counsell, "make benefit of the occasion, deliuer "the Romans their Emperour, whereby "thou mayest obtaine with them a per-"fect peace for thy selfe and vs: and so "I conclude that thy fortunes are great, "and wherof I am glad, if thou thy selfe "know how to vse them.

Other Princes also of the East, as of the Bactrians, Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had such a sense of these ignominious v-sages, that they disdained to receiue the letters from Sapor of his Victorious successe, and sent their Ambassadors to Rome, proffering their assistance for the redemption of their Emperour; yet all auailed not, and Sapor held still his Prisoner, abating nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captiues misery, but in the end (so hellish a fiend is reuenge) commanded his eyes to bee pulled out, and so for age and griefe hee dyed, as Eusebius sayth: but Agathus (a writer of credit) reporteth, that he was flaied aliue by direction of this vnhumane King. Thus did God punish one Tyrant by another, and thus himselfe felt those torments vnpitied, which hee had without pitty inflicted on others. The race of whose Raigne is accounted to bee seuen yeares before his Captinity, wherein hee liued almost so long as Galienus his sonne sate Emperour, and dyed in the yeere 261.

An. D. 261.

VALERIAN now Captiue in Persia, (while Odenatus grasping the aduantage, tooke vpon him the Empire of the East; and the now guideless Army of Rome, occupied onely in spoile and mutiny, their Leaders in faction, and the whole State astonished in affrighted terrour and amazement,) Balista (a gallant Romane gentleman) moued with the instant misery of the Common-wealth, resolued by electing a new anew an EMPEROVR, to preuent the apparant ruine of his owne Country: yet neuer in his worthy reſolution, once dreamed of Galienus, (though before choſen Auguſtus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Army forcibly ſetled the Garland vpon Marcian and his two ſonnes, as the moſt worthy; who with his eldeſt not long after was ſubdued by Aurelius vſurping Illyria (againſt Galienus then receiued Soueraign by the Roman Senate) and his yongeſt betraied to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the diſtracted Empire to thoſe three; of which the laſt diſdaining much the indignity offered to the State of Rome by that baſe captiuity of Valerian, whoſe calamity nothing touched the ſenſe of his vnnaturall ſonne, entred a warre againſt the Perſians, and tooke from them their Cities Niſabis and Carras. But ſuch was the moderation of this man, that although he had power of an independant Soueraignty, yet he held ſtill a good correſpondency and intelligence in all his actions of Gouernment with Galienus, to whom he ſent (as monument of Victory and Reuenge) ſuch of the Perſian Nobility as became his Priſoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Galienus triumph. But ſuch was the baſeneſſe of Galienus, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himſelfe eclipſe the true merit of Odenatus, hee endeuored to deface by treachery what hee could not ſuppreſſe by valour. But in this failing, he made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, ſtiling him Auguſtus, and ſtamping his face and the Perſian Triumph vpon the publike Coyne of the State, by approbation of the Senate; leauing him alone to defend thoſe Frontiers of the Empire, whileſt himſelfe, neither regarding his old fathers miſeries, (moſt miſerable that he had ſo vnnatural a ſonne) the diſhonour of the Roman State, nor the reuolts of the Prouinces, wherof newes was dayly brought him, ſpent his vnprincely thoughts vpon fruitleſſe deuices, as in reſeruing ſundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow greene and flouriſh all ſeaſons of the yeere; and (which was worſe) vpon women and wanton dallyances. Yet had he a Lady of excellent beauty and allurements, Cornelia Salonina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Marcomanni, whoſe feature we finde often minted vpon her Monies. His ſonne by her Saloninus hee adopted Cæſar, of whom there is no more remembred in Story, then that hee was borne noble, trained vp princely, and periſhed through the errours of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinius Valerianus (to whom the father had giuen the title of Cæſar) he added the honour of Auguſtus. And therefore we haue not held it improper, to adioyne to his their monyes in the front of his life.

(2). The calamities of this Emperours time, were ſo many as almoſt exceed credit: and Signes ſhewed both in the Heauens and the Earth, manifeſted his wrath that ſate vpon the Throne of Iaſper, from whoſe preſence iſſued Thundrings, Lightnings, and voyces. For (by Writers of beſt credit) the Sunne was clouded as vnder ſackcloth, and not ſeene for many dayes together: Earth-quakes great, & fearfully reſounding, ouerthrew cities & other edifices, ſhaking the ground ſo terribly, that vaſte Caues, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and whereout (no leſſe ſtrangely) flowed great ſtreames of ſalt waters. The Earth roared, & ſeemed to thunder, when there was no voice heard in the aire. The Sea ouer-ſwelled her bankes, & brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, & People: and (beſides al theſe) ſo violent a Peſtilence raged, that in Rome, no leſſe then 5. thouſand perſons dyed in a day.

(3) Theſe miſeries ſomewhat moued this Heatheniſh Emperour to remorſe: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Diuine Powers, hee ſtayed the Perſecutions of the Chriſtians, ſending out his Edicts in fauour of them. For not only the Heauens, Earth, & Seas declared the anger of their God, out of whoſe mouth went a two-edged ſword, but the Prouinces alſo ſeemed to be remoued out of th ir places. The Soldiers of al parts electing their own Generals, aduanced no leſſe then Thirty at once; who aſſumed the title of Emperours but are recorded to Poſterities by the name of Vſurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly oppoſite each to other, ſo were they ioyntly almoſt all bent againſt Galienus; wherby the Roman Empire was more oppreſſed with her owne forces, then euer it had beene by forraine powers. And ſince ſix of them aſſumed the Purple Robe in this Weſterne Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the courſe of Story, with a light touch to remember them, and to expreſſe their Monies, as we haue done the reſt of thoſe that held the reines of gouernment in theſe parts of the Roman world.

M. Caſ.

M. Cassius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Saloninus (who was committed to his education by Galienus) assumed the Empire, by ayde and encouragement of those of Gallia, ouer whom he had borne the office of liefetenancy by fauour of Valerian the Emperour. And these againe, as all Populars greedy of Innouation, from him and Iunius Cassius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after ten yeeres gouernement. This opportunity either made by L. Ælianus, or fitly taken, mounted him vp with ease into that Emperiall throne, in which he sate not with like fortune of continuance, though of confusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Victorinus and Lucius his son; both in a tumult neer Coleyn by their souldiers murthered. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, hee had to all the most excellent Emperors bin nothing inferiour; in the best of their other vertues.

(4) The restlesse humor now of the giddy Commons, next setleth it selfe vpon Aurelius Marius, a Soueraigne suitable in his meane condition to their base affections (for hee was no better then a Black-smith) yet to him a man of their own meanes & making, they were no lesse vnconstant and cruel, then to the rest: after three dayes, setting an end of his gouernment, with a sword of his owne forging. And therefore Pinesius Tetricus the father and sonne, though ascending the the throne of Maiesty, with the greatest applause of that people, and filling it vp with much merit and happy successe of their own; when they considered the insufferable insolencies and desperate practises of that prophane ranke, chose rather to adorne Aurelians Triumph, in a voluntary captiuity, then to liue aud rule at the deuotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannonians raised Ingenuus: The Mysians, A. Regillianus: The Ægyptians, Æmilianus: In Africa Celsus was proclaimed: In Illyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odenatus, (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous wife; Whose valour was so feared of Galienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow-Emperor, with the stile of Augustus, as wee haue remembred before.) Apoc. 6. 4.

(5) Finally, when Galienus had raigned from his first Associating with his Father the terme of fifteen yeeres, Martian, Heraclianus, and Ceronius, three of his principall Captaines, (compounding together that one of them should bee Emperour) plotted his death, whils he besieged the City Millan, where they traiterously murthered him, the yeere of our Lord two hundred sixty nine, after that he had suffered the Empire to bee rent in peeces, and vsurped by many Forrain and barbarous Nations.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Flauius Claudius Emp.

An. D. 269.

ROmes glory thus declining and the Imperiall Foundations thus vndermined, the aspiring tops of all that beauteous frame began to shake, & to fore-shew the signes of her approching fall. And had not the Fates euen at that instant raised a stay to vnderprop the Walles, those mounted Towers which so long had braued the Skie, had been laid leuell with the Ground, & made the ruines of All-consuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the strange confusions vnder the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the waight of those thirty heads at once: of which number though many of them by their owne mutuall rauening were consumed before the death of Galienus, yet the mightiest, as Aurelius Gouernour of Dalmatia; Tetricus and Victorinus, who held Britaine and Gallia: & Zenobia (the Heroicke Queene and wife of Odenatus) all the East; to omit the Murderers of Galienus, that durst not make their claime, (their deed so ill disgested) all these were still remaining and strong, at such time as Flauius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Wals of Milan, and confirmed with much ioy by the Senate in Rome.

His descent.

(3) This Flauius was descended of noble Parentage out of Dalmatia, by some; or as others say, of Dardania, and sprung from the Troian blood. But Aurelius Victor will haue him the sonne of Gordianus the Emperor before spoken of. Howsoeuer, a most worthy man he was, an excellent Captaine, of singular continencie, a iust Iudge, a louer of strangers, seuere to the wicked, but most benigne to the vertuous: so that we may well say, In Rome was a new world; or at least, In the World was a new Rome.

Aurel. Victor.

Flauius Claudius his vertues.

(4) His first Expedition was against Aurelius, that held Milan, whom he there slew, and ioyned his souldiers to his own strength. But preferring the general good before his particular quiet, he addressed his warres for the East, against the Gothes, who (as Iornandes their Story-writer reporteth) had infested those parts of the Empire (for fifteene yeeres continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entred friendship with many other like barbarous Nations, inuading Thracia, and the Countryes before them, euen vnto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungary, came downe the Riuer Danuby, with two thousand Saile of Ships, fraught with Munition and Men. To meet these, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

Iornandes. Gothes inuade the Empire.

Two thousand saile of Gothes

(5) "Renowned Fathers and Reuerend "Lords, vnderstand yee for certaine, that "three hundred and twenty thousand men of "warre are entred our Confines, whose "weight doth seeme to burden the "Earth it selfe, and whose warre-like "preparations make these parts of the "Empire to tremble and quake; with "whom I am now to strike battaile: "wherein if the Conquest be mine, the "ioy will be yours; But if I fal, yet I pray "remember that I fight after Galienus "hath raigned, and rent the strength of "the Romans in these remote Prouinces; "and after the Rebellions of Lollianus, "Posthumus, Eugenius, Regillianus, Celsus, "and others, who haue so weakened the "sinewes of our Armes, and broken the "Swords and Launces of our defence, that "I may well say, We want, if not "strength, yet weapons therewithall to "fight. And to our shame be it spoken, "Zenobia a Woman commands all our "Crosse-bowes, and bends them against "our vnarmed brests. How small soeuer "therefore our performance shall bee in "this seruice, repute it (I pray) for great, "and wish our proceedings may sort to "the weale of the Empire.

Claudius letter to the Senate.

(6) Which done with no daunted spirit he entred Battaile, and with more then wonted courage fought so valiantly that hee slew and tooke Prisoners, to the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, with two thousand Ships laden with Munition; so that whole houses were filled to their tops with Targets, Shieldes, Swords, and Launces, and other abilliments for Warre, whereof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemy with successe of Victory, in Thracia neere Bizantium, in Macedonia neere Thessalonica, droue the Gothes out of those parts which they had so long infested; and restored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into Germany, neere the Lake called Garda, gaue that reuolted Nation a great ouerthrow, where (as Eutropius and Victor doth report) hee vanquished two thousand of those strong Germans, and there established againe their subiection to the Romans power. And now minding to go forward against Tetricus and the puissant Zenobia, a Feauer did first cut off his purpose, and shortly after his life: a thing very strange and rare in that age, as by the course of their raignes wee haue hitherto seene; not that so great a Monarch should die; (they being all of the same earthly mould that meanest men are) but that in those daies a Roman Emperour should die in his bed, as other men doe of a naturall death.

Gothes vanquished.

Flauius Claudius dyed a naturall death.

(7) He was of personage tall, his body well composed and strong, bright and cleere eyes, his face great and full; and of life most temperate and chaste. He raigned one yeare, tenne moneths and fifteene dayes, and dyed the fourth of February, in the yeere of Christ, two hundred seuenty one. His Statue of Gold was set vp in the Capitoll, and his Target of the same mettall hung vp in the Senate-house; himselfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Romane Emperours that were deified for Gods: such an estimation and loue did his vertuous life procure vnto him euen after his death.

CHAPTER. XXXVIII.

A. Quintilius Emperour.

QVintilius, the Brother of Claudius and Vice-Roy, in his abſence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Armie whereof hee had command, proclaimed EMPEROVR immediately vpon the Newes of Claudius his death: the Senate as ioyfully confirming his Election, as they were ſorrowful for their loſſe of his moſt wor thy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much vnlike; ſo that what ſeemed to bee paſt in the one, was in the other ſupplyed and ſtill remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wiſe for Ciuill Gouernment, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an abſolute Prince.

Quintilius brother to the laſt Emperor.

(2) But long his glaſſe ſtood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fauning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiers which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themſelues worthy of the firſt voice in Election, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperour, a moſt valiant Captain; and of whoſe proweſſe there had beene ſo ſufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew hee could not ſtand againſt him.

And therefore miſtruſting the ſtrength of his Title, and the affections of his Souldiers, reputed it ignominious for a noble minde, to die with leſſe honour then hee attained vnto, and enioyed by his life: and therefore reſoluing to die an Emperour, choſe rather by a voluntary cutting of his own veines, to powre out his life with his bloud, then to hazard the chance of vncertaine warres, or to returne to his priuate eſtate.

Quintilius cut his own veins and ſo bled to death.

And thus no longer raigning then ſeuenteen dayes (which ſhort time could miniſter little matter of larger diſcourſe) hee dyed with his Brother the ſame moneth of February the twentieth day, and yeere of Chriſt his incarnation, two hundred ſeuenty one.

He raigned but ſeuenteen dayes.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Val. Aurelianus Emperour.

An. D. 271.

SO short was the Raigne of the last Emperor Quintilius, that Aurelianus who followed him may be said to be the Successor of Claudius not of him: being elected by his Legions in the East, as soone as the other had been in Italy (though confirmed before him of the Senate in Rome) continued still his riuall for Maiesty, and attained the top of that high set Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the first step.

Aurelianus his descent.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honorable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia, others of Mysia; both so doubtfull that Flauius Vopiscus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaues it vndecided, and to the censure of his Readers. His risings were by the Warres; whereunto from his childhood hee had a naturall inclination: and for continuall carrying of his weapons, was commonly called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

Flauius Vopiscus.

(3) His seruice was sufficiently known to the Generals of diuers Prouinces, who had forty sundry times imployed him in the charge of a Lieutenant: & vnder Claudius in Persia hee was the Coronell of the Horse. In the wars of Sarmatia he is reported to haue slaine forty enemies with his own hands in one day; & at other seuerall times, to the number of nine hundred more, as both Vopiscus and Theoclius haue affirmed. And generally so famous were his deedes, both before he was Cæsar, and after, as that he is by some compared with Iulius and Alexander.

Aurelianus comparable with Cæsar and Alexander

(4) Vpon the ratifyings of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee hasted not thither to be saluted and enstalled Emperour, but forthwith marched against the Sueuians and Sarmates, who sore infested the Empire with wars: and hauing soone subdued them, and quieted those parts, in great haste hee came into Italy against the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as far as Milan: and them likewise with great valour he forced thence. Then entring Rome with great pompe, caused the Walles to bee repaired and inlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Victorious Emperors. But long he staied not, ere hee returned into Syria, against the stout Queene Zenobia, whose braue resolutions, & warlike power for fight, her Letter in answer vnto him (when being sorely tired, he proffered her wealth, life, and liberty to yeeld) doth manifestly declare: the tenor thereof being as followes.

Aurelianus inlarged the walles of Rome.

(6) This haughtie anſwer of that vndaunted Queene, put more fire to the fury of Aurelianus, who took the letter in ſuch ſcorne, that hee threatned death to the Inditer, (whō he ſuppoſed to be Longinus the Philoſopher who was alwaies with her and her Inſtructer) which afterwards he did accōpliſh: for deſtroying her ſeuerall Aids before they could meete together, and beſieging Palmyra her ſtrong City, he brought the ſame to ſuch deſtreſſe, that in the end he took her Captiue; and glad of ſuch a prey, carried her himſelfe to Rome where following his Chariot of Triumph, attired in Tiſſues and richeſt Robes of price, ſhe was led his Priſoner in Chains of Gold: vpon whoſe preſence the Spectators with admiration ſo much gazed, that ſomewhat it dimmed the Maieſty of Aurelianus: for ſhe is ſaid to be exceedingly faire, though not very white, but ſomewhat browne: her eyes blacke and bright, her teeth ſhining like pearles, her body tall, and of moſt ſtately proportion, her countenance modeſt, milde, and pleaſing; her voice ſweet, her conuerſation honeſt, her minde chaſte, and body continent, wiſe, temperate, & learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues, hauing read the Roman hiſtory in Greek, & her ſelfe abridged the Alexandrian, & all the Orientall hiſtories. Yea the atchiuement of this Conqueſt was held ſo notable, that he reputed himſelfe the Reſtorer of the Eaſt, as it appeareth by the reuerſe of his money here prefixed in the entrance of his raigne.

(7) Theſe Acts of Aurelianus made him ſo famous abroad; & feared at home, that Tetricus which had held out againſt Galienus, came in vnder his protectiō, holding it more ſafe to be a Subiect in quiet, then a Commander againſt an Oppoſite of ſo inuincible a mind: by whom thereupon hee was made Gouernour of Campania, and of other Proninces in Italy.

(8) Hitherto this Emperours ſucceſſes were very proſperous (we may well ſuppoſe) for his indulgence to the Chriſtians whoſe aſſemblies he permitted, & whoſe Biſhops he ſo fauored, that at their requeſt he baniſhed Paule Samoſatenus the Hereticke out of their Synods. But afterward Satan minding to ſift the Wheat, that the Chaffe might bee his, ſtirred vp this Emperour, to raiſe the Ninth Perſecution, & to ſend foorth his Edicts for the deſtruction of Gods Saints: which whileſt he was in peruſing, & about to ſet his hand & ſeale, a Thunderbolt from Heauen ſtruck into his preſence, and ſo neere vnto his perſon, that all accounted him to bee therewith ſlaine, God warning him by this his Meſſenger to be wiſe leaſt he periſhed in his own wayes as ſhortly after he did, being ſlaine by his Seruants, through the Treaſon of Meneſtheus his Secretary, the nine & twentieth day of February following, neere vnto the City Bizantium, when hee had ſate Emperour foure yeeres, eleuen moneths, and ſeuen dayes, the yeere of our happineſſe, two hundred ſeuenty ſix.

(9) Hee was of ſtature tall, of body well ſhaped, a pleaſing countenance, and of a ſeemely preſence, a great feeder, and very ſeuere, whereby he was as much feared as beloued, and therefore reported to bee a good Phyſitian, but that he miniſtred too bitter Potions; and was Canonized after his death among the holy Emperours: in the ſecond yeere of whoſe raigne, the Great Conſtantine of Helena in Britaine was borne.

Chapter XL.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. D. 276.

THe former ſeditions ended by Aurelianus, & the ſtate of the Empire remaining now in quiet, no man appeared to ſue, much leſſe tumultouſly to ſtriue for that Royall Diademe, but all the great Commanders (as though they made curteſie in giuing way each vnto others) ſtood at the foot of Maieſty, no man attempting higher to moũt. The ſouldiers ſent to the Senate to deſigne the man whom they beſt liked; the Senate requeſted the ſouldiers to elect him whom they held worthieſt; In which reſpectiue complements, and moſt kinde correſpondency of all parts, eight moneths paſſed with a peaceable Interregnum, as writers report.

Aurelianus being dead no man ſought to be Emperor

Euſebius. Vopiſcus. Oroſius. Onuphrius.

(2) It ſeemeth, the freſh ſenſe and fearfull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wiſe, then to ſeeke their owne death, and eſpecially the Generals to be better aduiſed, then to runne deſperately vpon their owne deſtructions. A change vncredible, that Thirty ere whiles would needes be ſtiled Emperours, among the tumultuous Souldiours (though they were ſure to buy the vſe of that name with their deareſt bloud) and not one now in peace could be found either haſty to ſeeke it, or very willing to accept it.

(3) At laſt both Senate and Souldiers, hauing in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Conſular degree, of great age, ſingular learning, and long experience in Magiſtracy; him by a ioynt and conſpiring ſuffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he hauing before hand ſome inkling of this their purpoſe, got him out of the way, liuing very ſecretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (ſayth Vopiſcus) that high dignity which he fore-ſaw would proue his ouerthrow. And when they did by Embaſſages often ſollicite him to accept of their Electiõ, ſending him the Enſignes and Stile of Auguſtus: he againe returned them, though with harty thanks, yet abſolute deniall, alledging by reaſon of his age and infirmity, that he was euery way vnable to diſcharge their ſo great expectations.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperor.

(4) But after much inter-courſe, and many intreaties paſſed, at length (the neceſſity of the State ſo requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himſelfe, who knew the waight of ſo great titles would proue heauy & alwaies dangerous for him to beare; but with vnſpeakeable ioy, was receiued by the whole State, which promiſed all bleſſed hopes to the State vnder ſo worthy, ſo wiſe, ſo vertuous, learned, and ſo iuſt an Emperour.

(5) For as before his aduancement, he was of exemplary compoſednes & vertuous diſpoſition, ſo in this high Eſtate, his life was temperate, and without all pride: and ſo deſirous to be a Preceder of moderation and ſingularity vnto others, as that he would not permit his Empreſſe to weare any Iewels of high price, nor to vſe other cuſtomable ſuperfluity, or exceſſe in his owne houſe. For learning and learned men, whom he euer embraced in his priuate Eſtate, hee now by all meanes endeuored to honour and aduance, and publi-publikely profeſſed, that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was to aſcribe them to his ſtudy of good letters. For which cauſe, he was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthieſt Hiſtorian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preſerued in euery Library throughout the Empire; and ten times euery yeare to be tranſcribed on publique coſt. All which notwith ſtanding, many of that worthy Authors Bookes haue ſince miſcarried.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enioy: & ſith his Raign was but ſhort it is bootleſſe to lengthen it with long diſcourſes: For his peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his ſhort time (wherein hee did nothing without conſent of the Senate) was ſpent rather reforming other mens vices, and abuſes of the Lawes and State, then in diſplaying his owne vertues; which doubtleſſe (if their faire ſtreame had not beene vntimely ſtopt) would haue proued incomparable to any his fore-goers, and vnmatcheable by any his followers. What death he dyed is left vncertaine; Eutropius thinketh him ſlaine, by his rebellious ſouldiers in Aſia, vpon his voyage againſt the Perſians: but Victor reporteth that he dyed a naturall death, and that of a burning-feuer, in the City of Tharſus: And Flauius Vopiſcus, (who wrote his life) ſaith his death came vpon a ſurcharge of griefe, by reaſon of factions; whereby (the infirmity of his age thereto helping) his vnderſtanding was crazed, and his heart broken, whereof hee dyed, when he had raigned ſix moneths, and twenty dayes, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, 276.

Florianus made himſelfe Emperour.

NO ſooner was the death of Tacitus diuulged, but his brother Florianus (much vnlike him in that point) tooke vpon the Name, and Authoritie Imperiall, without expecting any Election either of Senate or Souldiers; and therefore not likely long to ſtand ſure. And although in all other princely parts hee was not much vnlike his brother, yet hauing ſo great an Oppoſite as Probus was, on whom the Eaſterne Armie had conferred the ſame Title, the bloſſomes of his conceited hope withered euen in the budde, and periſhed before they had any time of growth.

(2) For, no ſooner came to his eares the newes of Probus his election, but he found that heady & precipitate attempts were pleaſing in their Beginnings, but full of difficulties in their Proceedings, & moſt diſaſtrous in their Succeſſe: and therefore deſpairing both of Men and Meanes to raiſe the Building, whoſe foundation he had ſo haſtily (but too weakely) layd, he cauſed his own veines to be cut, as Quintilius before him in like caſe had done, whereby he boldly bled to death, after hee had enioyed a Titular Soueraignty only eighty dayes, ſayth Eutropius: but Vopiſcus ſayth not altogether two moneths, and thinkes him killed by the Souldiers, in the City Tharſus likewiſe, in the yeere of Chriſt two hundred ſeuenty and ſeuen.

CHAPTER XLII.

Val. Probus Empesour.

An.D.277. THE Easterne Army most potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from them was expected the new Emperours election, which accordingly they did, but with much more wisedome and deliberate circumspection, then the Souldiers of those times were accustomed to doe. For euery Captaine of the Army singled out his owne Companies, and in seuerall Assemblies exhorted, that all affections layd aside, they would apply their mindes to think of the worthiest man on whom they might conferre their voyces and fauours. At which time the opinion of Probus his worth had so generally possessed the hearts of all men, that the shout and cry of all was vniforme, Let vs haue Probus for our Emperour. This being signified to Rome, the Senate with applause & thankes approued and confirmed his election, with additions to his Tirle, Augustus, The Father of his Country, and the highest Bishop. For in those times, euen amongst Heathens, the sacred Title of a Bishop was accounted an additament of honour euen to an Emperour.

Probus called father of his Country, and the highest Bishop.

His descent.

(2) He was borne in Hungary in the City Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, especially by his mothers side. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Military Seruice, who dyed Tribune at the warres in Ægypt: and himselfe very yong, but very valorous, by the Emperor Valerianus (who so loued him for his vertues, that he vsed to say of him, that of all men hee best deserued the name Probus, that is, vertuous) was made a Tribune also. In which office, with great prayse he serued vnder Galienus, Aurelianus, & Claudius the Emperours: vnder whom, besides other exploits he fought seuerall single-combats to the great honour of himselfe and Country, and receiued as markes of victories, many Ciuicall Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Ensignes of Martiall deuice and Priuiledge. Preferred to be Generall in Africa he subdued the Marmarides: In Ægypt the Palmerines; vnder Aurelianus the Sarmates and Germans; vnder Claudius the Gothes; & in all places so famous for his Acts, that he was compared with Hannibal & Cæsar.

Sabellicus.

Probus comparable with Hannibal and Cæsar

(3) His first seruice after he became Emperour was in Gallia, against the Germans, that had made themselues Lords thereof, where in one Battell, continuing two daies, he slew foure hundred thousand of them, and recouered seuenty Cities, from the enemy, as himself signified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Sclauonia, he quieted the Prouinces of Muscouia, Russia, and Polonia: And entring Thracia, did no lesse in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Palestina, & Iudea; whence passing into Persia, hee had honourable compositions of Narseus their mighty king. Wherupon issued so vniuersall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Prouinces of the Empire; insomuch that it was a common Prouerbe, The very mice durst not gnaw for feare of Probus, But long it lasted not ere he was disturbed: for the Ægyptians erected one Saturninus a Captaine both wise and valiant, for Emperour, and that so sore against his wil, as he was like to be slaine by them for gaine-saying their desires; and by a speech deliuered to his erectors, hee made knowne to them his auersnes from so dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

" (4) Fellowes and Friends, by my whole " endeuors I haue alwaies sought to pre- " uent that, which now I see I cannot " shunne, I meane the Throne of Maiesty, " which howsoeuer to others, it may " seeme full of glory and security, yet to " my selfe, I foresee it will proue, both " base

"base and dangerous: Base for that I am "no more the master of mine owne affe- "ctions: which hitherto in my priuate "estate were bestowed freely, & where I "thought best, but must hence-forth be "carried at other mens dispose, and cast "vpō those that deserue them least. That "little time that I was wont to take, in "tyring my selfe to my selfe, must now "bee straitned to serue others; and my "thoughts wholy spent to preuent those "weapons, which are borne (in shew) for "my defence, but are (in truth) the keyes "of mine Imprisonment. I cannot goe "without a Guard: I cannot sleepe, with- "out a watch; I cannot eate without a "Taster; these are but bondages to a free "condition, and neuer neede in a priuate "fortune. That it is dangerous, it is no lesse "apparant: for besides the sharpe-pointed "and waighty sword hanging onely by a "twisted threed ouer our heads, Probus is "not a Gallienus to cōpound for the Dia- "dem, but to touch his scepter, is to awake "a sleeping Lion: What should moue "you then to stir vp his wrath, to seeke "my death, and your own destructions? "For assure your selues when I die, I shal "not die alone: So all our fame purcha- "sed in so many yeers imployments, shal "be lost by this one dayes worke: & my "Conquests in Africa, of the Moores, and "in Spaine, branded lastly with the eter- "nall scarres and infamy of Rebellion.

(5) These speeches (as Flauius Vopiscus the Writer thereof receiued them from the re port of his Grand-father, who was there present and heard them) could nothing at all diuert the resolution of the Souldiers, but that they persisted and maintained their election against Probus: who vpon notice thereof, hastning toward them with a mighty power, offered them pardon, as one vnwilling to shed Ciuill-bloud, or to lose so worthy a mā as Saturninus was: but vpon refusal of his proffered Clemency, he gaue him a most sharpe battell, wherin most of the Reuolters were ouer-throwne, and Saturninus in the assault of a Castle besieged, was slaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who sought to haue saued his life.

Saturninus his death.

(6) But with his death ended not all Ciuill Broiles: for Bonosus & Proculus two monsters of that age (though of different kinds of vices) opposing themselues against him, and assuming the Title and Robes Imperiall, vsurped the Prouinces of Britaine, Spaine, and some part of Gallia, knowing that in these places Probus was not much beloued. Bonosus was borne in Britaine, but brought vp in Spaine, without note of action but onely in his cups, for he was esteemed the greatest drinker of all men liuing: insomuch as Aurel. said of him, he was born, non vt viueret, sed vt biberet; not to draw breath, but to draw in liquor: and yet (as it seemeth) hee was in good account vnder the said Aurelianus, hauing charge of Ships vpon the German Seas, which either by treachery or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the mouth of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the priuity of Bonosus: who therefore not daring to stand to the try-all, made all his powers against the Emperour, but was in Battell ouercome, and despairing euer againe to make head, put his owne in a haltar, whereupon it was sayd, that a Barrell was hanged and not a Man.

(7) Proculus was a Lygurian borne, as vnsatiate a vassall to Venus, as the other to Bacchus; and therewithall so impiously impudent, that as he had a heart to commit any filthinesse, so a forehead to boast of it openly, as appeareth by his owne Letters, wherein he vaunteth, how many scores of faire Virgins hee depriued of that faire name in one fortnight; but this Grand-Generall of Venus Campe was suddenly forsaken by his Souldiers, and came to his deserued end.

(8) Some stirs there were at that present in Britanny by the incitements of their Gouernour, whose name though Histories doe not specifie, yet he may seeme to be that Cl. Corn. Lælianus, whose ancient Coynes are found in this Iland, and not else-where: and his meanes to the place, was Victorinus a Moore, in great fauour with Probus: who taking himselfe not cleare from suspition, got leaue of his Emperor to repaire vnto Britaine, where giuing it out that hee was come thither for safety of his life, was courteously receiued by the Generall; Whom secretly in the night hee murthered, and then speedily returned to Rome; hauing by this Expedition, both appeased the tumults in the Prouince, and approued his fidelity to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Vandals & Burgundians that had inuaded Gallia, were sent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabite, who, though they had troubled the Romanes peace in Gallia, yet did them good seruice in Britaine to stay their subiection; and the Britaines themselues for some good seruices were now suffered by these Em-

(9) At length the Empire in theſe Weſt parts ſtanding vniuerſally quiet, Probus determined a journey into the Eaſt, to end at once all forraine warres, ſaying, he would ſhortly bring it to paſſe, that the State ſhould need no more Souldiers: (which ſpeech they tooke very indignely) & hauing paſſed Illyricum in Slauonia, was by ſome of his owne Army (for curbing, as they conceiued, with an ouer hard-hand their diſſolute and idle maners) conſpired againſt and treacherouſly murthered, in Nouember the ſecond, & yeer of Chriſt two hundred eighty two, hauing raigned fiue yeers, and foure moneths: others ſay ſix yeeres: where notwithſtanding they erected for him a moſt honourable Sepulcher, wherein was engrauen this Epitath: Here lieth the Emperor Probus, juſtly for his goodnes called Probus, of all the Barbarous Nations and Tyrants a Conquerour.

PRobvs thus ſlaine in the midſt of his Army, without any apparant cauſe miniſtred, the Souldiers were ſtricken into a great feare, and miſtruſted each other to be guilty of the Treaſon: no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor haſty to puniſh the bloudy executors, but holding the right of election to remaine in themſelues, they preſently choſe Carus for their Emperour, who had beene the Pretorian Præfect, valiant, ſufficient, of worth and eſteeme: whereunto the Senate likewiſe conſented.

(2) From whence or what parents we ſhould deriue his birth, is vncertaine; and of diuers writers diuerſly reported. For Flauius Cæcilianus, who wrot the ſtory of his time, as Vopiſcus doth report, ſaith that he was borne in Sclauonia, or as we call it Moſconia. Oneſimus an ancient writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, and that his father was a Slauonian indeede, but held for a citizen, as he citeth by letters from Vopiſcus: Aurelius Victor, Euſebius, & Paulus Oroſius will haue him a French man, and borne at Narborne: but whenceſoeuer, his princely parts deſerued theſe his princely preferments, and no wayes for the ſhort time of his raigne, carried hee himſelfe vnder expectation. (3) His firſt proceedings was to finde out the murtherers of Probus, whom he ſeuerely puniſhed, which tooke away all ſuſpition of treaſon in himſelfe. Then marching againſt the Sarmates, whoſe fury furie had pierced ſo far into Pannonia, that they threatned Italy it ſelfe, he ouerthrew with the ſlaughter of ſixteen thouſand, & tooke twenty thouſand of them priſoners. And leauing Carinus (his elder ſon) to gouerne Britaine, Gallia, Illyricum, and Spaine; himſelfe with the yonger Numerianus, prepared for the Eaſt againſt the Perſians, in which expedition he tooke in his way Meſopotamia, Seleucia, & certaine cities whom the enemy had entred: and being ſurprized with ſicknes, & not able to trauell, pitched his pauilion vpon the ſhore of Tigris, where in the midſt of his army (about the yeere of our ſaluation 283.) garded from all ſuppoſed dangers and aſſaults of man, felt the vnexpected ſtroke of death euen from the hand of God himſelfe: for in his bed by a thunder bolt falling from heauen he was ſlain with many others then preſent with him in his tent, and the ſame conſumed altogether with lightning fire.

Carus ſlaine by a thunder-bolt.

(4) The terrour thereof ſo daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterpriſe: and his death was ſo grieuous vnto Numerianus now elected Emperour, that with continuall weeping (a fault in few ſonnes who are raiſed by their fathers fall) his eyes were ſo weakned, that hee could not indure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wiues father) tooke occaſion to conſpire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Empire himſelfe. For hauing at all times free acceſſe to his preſence, at length in his cloſet he ſecretly murthered him; pretending to the army, that his infirmity onely kept him from ſight; and ſo leauing his body to putrifie and corrupt, in ſhort ſpace by the very ſauor therof the treaſon was diſcried, and the Traitor ſlaine by the hands of Diocleſian, who was both his Iudge & executioner.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the army proclaimed Diocleſian, a Principall man in the Campe for Emperour: who to vphold his election made all his power for Gallia, againſt his Concurrent Carinus, a man of profuſe ſenſuality, who there had cauſed himſelfe to bee proclaimed, and in his fathers abſence had ſo ruled there and in BRITAIN that Porphyrio liuing at the ſame time, gaue out this teſtimony, that Britaine was a fertile Prouince of tyrants. Betwixt theſe two Captaines, many skirmiſhes were fought with variable ſucceſſe, till laſtly in a ſet battell Carinus was ſlaine by a Tribune; whoſe Wife he had defiled; whereby the Imperiall Title was ioyntly conferred vpon Diocleſian. Hieroms.

An.D.285.

THe Empire thus deuolued to Diocleſian, with approbation of the Senate, hee euery way ſtudied to bee accounted worthy of the ſame, as knowing well his birth was no way anſwerable to his preſent lot: & therefore choſe for his Caeſar, Maximianus, a man of better deſcent, very honourable, wiſe, and valiant, as was manifeſted in his firſt ſeruice againſt the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of peſants in that prouince, troubling the peace of the Romans, he with much ſlaughter ouercame. For which exploit ſo fortunately accompliſhed, the Emperor made him his Conſort in the Gouernment.

Paul.Oroſius. Entropius.

(2) Diocleſians parentage is vncertainly reported by Writers, ſome making him the ſonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondman: but all agreeing that his Country was Dalmatia, and his offspring very baſe. This man being but a Common ſouldier, conſulted with a Witch for his future ſucceſſe; who told him (if you pleaſe to beleeue the reporters) that hee ſhould become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore; to which he gaue credit, & euer was a great enemy to that beaſt, and in time grew vnder Probus to ſo great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his houſe, and now laſtly elected to the Empire.

(3) The very firſt thing that he attempted was the puniſhment of his predeceſſors death: for which Arius Aper being conuicted before his tribunall ſeat, himſelf riſing ſuddenly from the throne, ran him thorow with his ſword, in outward ſhew for zeale of Iuſtice, as not able to endure ſo foule a fact: but in truth to fulfil the Prediction of his hoſteſſe, the Druide; for that Aper ſignifieth a Bore. After which act, he held his Empire fully eſtabliſhed.

(4) To let paſſe many employments and troubles of the State, theſe two Emperors choſe to themſelues two Caeſars, whereby the One-bodied Eagle became againe foure-headed, and each almoſt of an equal authority. Diocleſian choſe Galerius Maximinus; & Maximianus, ſurnamed Herculius, choſe Conſtantius Clorus a Romane Senator, enforcing them to put away their former Wiues, and to take their Daughters for an aſſurance of loue by the bonds of that Alliance; of whom the former was imploied for defence of Illyricum, and the other afterwards into Britaine againſt the Rebellion there raiſed by Carauſius, whoſe Coyne is here ſet.

(5) This

(5) This Caruſius, by birth was a Menapian, but of low parentage, as Beda & Eutropius ſaith; who being appointed Admirall by the Romans to guard the Britiſh Seas, from the Piracies of the Saxons and Lower Germans (who with continual robberies waſted the Coaſts) abuſed his authority both in ſuffering thoſe Pirates to paſſe vnder Compoſitions, and in taking many Shippes and much ſubſtance from the true Subiect to his owne vſe: whereby in ſhort time he became very rich, and (like a Cat ſet to keepe mice from the larder) did more miſchiefe then the Robbers themſelues. Sabellicus reports one very politike cuſtome whereby he inriched himſelfe; & that was, by ſuffering the Pirats to take as much ſpoyles as poſſibly they could before he would ſurpriſe thē; wherby they were his inſtruments to rob others, and nothing to better themſelues.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 1 cap. 6.

(6) Maximianus then warring in Gallia, and fearing the greatnes of his wealth & power, ſent ſecretly to ſlay him by treachery; and in the meane while ſurpriſed many of his principall men at Geſſoriacū*.

*Now called Boleyn in Picardy.

(7) Caruſius now rich and compaſſed with friends, ſeeing his deſtruction thus intended and ſought, thought that death was but death as well to Prince as to Peazant: and therefore with a bold reſolutiō, and aid of the Picts or Northern Britaines, (who had bin alwayes enemies to the Roman Subiection) put on the Purple Robe, and vſurped the Authoritie and Title of Emperour, which he moſt valiantly maintained in ſundry Battles, and ſo kept it for the terme of ſeuen yeeres.

Caruſius defendeth his vſurpation ſeuen yeeres.

(8) Againſt him Maximianus ſet forward with a puiſſant Armie, & marched to the Britiſh Ocean: but there vnderſtanding the power of his Enemie, and finding himſelfe in want of men for Sea-ſeruice, he pitched down his Tents: and knowing Caruſius a man meet to command the Ilanders, and able to defend them againſt the other Warlike Nations, ſent him offers of peace: the making of which is remembred vnto vs by the Coine of Caruſius before expreſſed, whereon are ſtamped the Portraitures of two Emperours ioyning hands. So himſelfe returning againſt the Batauians, left Caruſius for Britaine, who gouerned the Prouince with an vpright and vnſtained reputation, & with exceeding peaceableneſſe, notwithſtanding the Incurſions of the Barbarous. He reedified the wall (as Ninius the diſciple of Eluodugus writeth) betweene the mouthes of Cluda and Carunus, fortifying the ſame with ſeuen Caſtles, and built a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone vpon the banke of the Riuer Carun, which (ſome thinke) tooke name of him, erecting therewith a Triumphall Arch in remembrance of Victorie. Howbeit, Buchanan thinkes the ſame to be the Temple of Terminus, and not the foundation of Caruſius.

But the date of his noble Gouernment was brought now to a period, by the Treaſon of Allectus his familiar friend, one whom he had imployed in managing of the State, who thirſting after the Supreme Authoritie, betrayed his truſt, and treacherouſly murdered him by a wile, putting on himſelfe the Purple Robe, ſtamping this his Image vpon the publike Coine as an abſolute Soueraigne, and aſſuming the Title Imperiall, about the yeere of Chriſt 294.

(9) Conſtantius Clorus who had leuied an Armie, and was come with great ſpeede vnto Bulloigne in France, (a Towne that Caruſius had ſometime fortified & kept) hearing now of his death, determined the recouery of Britaine; and after great preparations, paſſing the Seas, in a dark fogge or miſt, vpon that Shore landed his men without impeachment: which done, he fired his owne Ships, thereby to fruſtrate all hopes of eſcape. Allectus, who had laien to intercept his comming, forſooke alſo the Seas, and meeting at vnawares with Aſclepiodotus, great Seneſchall of the Prætorium, as a deſperate man, haſted vpō his owne death: for encountring with him, he neither ordered his Battle, nor marſhalled his men, but fought at randome very vnfortunately: and hauing put off his Purple Garment, he was among

(10) The deaths of theſe two Vſurpers, with the recouerie of the Britaines vnto their wonted obedience, was accounted ſo great a benefit to the Romans, that it is moſt gloriouſly commended, and Rhetorically ſet downe in a Panegyricke Oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, in the prayſe of Diocleſian, Maximianus, & Conſtantius: where (after he had extolled the fertilitie of the Britiſh Soile, and the Riches that the Empire reaped thence) he ſet forth the ſtrength of the Enemy, growne to ſo dangerous a head: and concluded with this Acclamation; O what a manifold Victory was this, worthie vndoubtedly of innumerable Triumphs, by which Victorie Britaine is reſtored to the Empire, their Confederates brought to obedience, and the Seas ſecured to a perpetuall quietneſſe! Glory you therefore (inuincible Emperour) for that you haue as it were gotten another World, and in reſtoring to the Romans puiſſance the glory of the Conqueſt by Sea, haue added to the Roman Empire an Element greater then all the compaſſe of the Earth, that is, the mighty main Ocean it ſelfe: and afterwards; now by your Victories (Inuincible Conſtantius Cæſar) whatſoeuer did lie vacant about Amiens, Beauois, Trois, and Langres, *beginneth to flouriſh with Inhabitants of ſundry Nations. The Chriſtians torments ten yeeres together.

And amongſt others, it made Britaine to be honoured with the glory of many holy Martyrs, which conſtantly ſtood and died in the Confeſſion of the Faith; whereof the firſt is reported to be Albane of the Citie Verolanium, who was beheaded at Holmehurſt (ſince called Derſwold) where now the Towne of S. Albans (bearing his name) is built, and in whoſe honour, Offa the great King of Mercia founded a moſt magnificent Monaſterie. Of this Alban the ancient Fortunatus Priſcus in his booke of the Prayſe of Virginity, maketh mention thus:

(12) His Inſtructor Amphibolus afterwards apprehended, was brought to the ſame place, and whipped about a ſtake, whereat his intrailes were tied: ſo winding his bowels out of his body, was laſtly ſtoned to death. Sundry others alſo in other places layed downe their liues for their Profeſſion ſake, as Iulius and Aaron at Leiceſter, ſaith Beda, or rather at Caer-leon in Monmouthſhire, as our Grand-Antiquary judgeth: and in Leichfield ſo many, that the place became another Golgotha, A Field of dead Corps. For which cauſe the Citie doth beare an Eſcocheon or Field charged with many Martyres, for their Seale of Armes euen vnto this day.

But as thoſe foure Beaſts periſhed and were cruſhed by the fall of The ſtone cut without hands, Emmanuel borne in our fleſh: ſo this laſt Beaſt compounded of them Foure, fell in the deſtructions of theſe moſt wicked Emperors, wherof al almoſt died ſo vntimely & vnuſuall deaths, as the like is not read of elſewhere.

And as Famine in great Warres is not greatly ſtrange; ſo Scarcitie exceeding Plentie, was ſeene vnder the opening of the Third Seale; whence a Black Horſe ſent from God, paſſed through the earth, whoſe Rider bare a Ballance to weigh Corne, as it were Spice for dearth: and in the raigne of this laſt tyrant Diocleſian, they that had Eagles eyes might ſee the threefold iudgements of God in the opening of the Fourth Seale, when Sword, Famine, & Death went all together as a pale-horſe, ſent from the preſence of the Lamb, whoſe rider was Death & Hell, following as his Page. Theſe were the times of calamities, when as the Soules of the righteous in the opening of the Fift Seale, cryed for vengeance for the bloud of the Martyrs, whō theſe ten hornes had gored to death: And vnder the Sixth Seale, both then, and for euer the wicked are ſaid to call for the Mountaines to fall vpon them, and for the rockes to hide them from the preſence of Him that ſate vpon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lambe, before whom none could ſtand.

(15) It was the nineteenth yeere of his Raigne, in the Moneth of March, when this Tyrant ſent forth his wicked Edicts through all his Empire; That all churches ſhould be vtterly ouerthrowne; that the Scriptures ſhould be burnt, that all Chriſtians for honour ſhould be held infamous, and all Chriſtian ſeruants ſhould be held vncapable of freedome, that all Paſtours ſhould be inforced to offer to Idols, &c.

Euſeb eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 1. 2. 3.

(16) The fountaine and chiefe cauſe of theſe miſeries lighting on the Church of Chriſt, did ariſe from the Chriſtians themſelues, as Euſebius in theſe words declareth: After that our conuerſation through too much libertie and licentiouſneſſe was degenerated, & holy diſciplinecorrupted, whiles euery one of vs did enuie, bite, and backbite each other, waging inteſtine warres within our ſelues, and piercing one anothers hearts, with the ſharpe ſpeares of opprobrious words; ſo that Biſhops againſt Biſhops, and people againſt people were at bitter contention: Laſtly, whiles nothing but hypocriſie was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby miſchiefe was euen full at the brimme, then began the heauy hand of God to visit vs, &c. Where he proceedeth and sheweth that the grieuous sinnes of the Christians were the cause of drawing down these judgements on their heads.

(17) And so this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Instrument and Iron-threshing-flaile, to bruise the precious wheat and seed of the Gospell, and to crush that outward glory of the Christian profession, which then was flourishing in most parts of the world.

Euseb. eccles. hist. lib. 8. cap. 21.

(18) But long the Lord deferred not their release, nor that Tyrants end. For after the first yeere of their persecutions, and twentieth of his Raigne, the thirteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of Christs Natiuitie three hundred and three, he with his Fellow Emperor (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, stricken with a mad humor (saith Eusebius) renounced the Empire, and descending from the Tribunall put off their Purple and Imperiall robes, whereby they againe became Priuate men.

(19) Diocletian retired into Dalmatia, where in the Citie Salonia, he poisoned himselfe, as Aurelius Victor affirmeth: and Eusebius sayth, that no small disease ouertooke him, for that he dyed mad. His consort Maximianus escaped not vnpunished, but dyed for attempting the Murther of Constantius, and as Eusebius auoucheth, hee hanged himselfe in the Citie Marsillis: such ignominious deaths followed these two persecuting Tyrants, whereof Diocletian had formerly made himselfe a God, and by an Edict commanded his Foote to bee kissed: a practise pretily since imitated by his Successors, who haue reuiued the wounded Head of the Beast, and haue trod his steppes in wounding and persecuting the true members of Christ.

Constantius Chlorus, Emp.

G. Val. Maximianus, Emp.

Diocletian and Maximianus resigned vp the Empire the 9. Cal of May, in the yeere of Christ 304. Galerius and Constantius Emperours.

Diocletian and Maximianus resigning vp their Soueraignties (as is said) at the Citie Nicomedia in Bithynia, committed the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-weale vnto Galerius [illegible]nstantius, who had beene their Cæsars: vpon which occasion, great peace followed in the Church of CHRIST, and most especially vnto these Westerne Prouinces. For those Emperours confirmed by the Senate, presently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Estates, and not subiect to one Gouernment, as formerly had beene exercised; which (as Eusebius hath noted) was the fatall end of the Imperiall Glorie.

The Christian enioy peace.

(2) Vnto

Maximianus and Severus made Cæsars.

(2) Vnto Galerus fell the gouernment of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Prouinces in Asia, who tooke for ease of that burden these two whose Coines we haue here expressed.

G. Galerius, Valer, Maximinus, and Aurel. Valer. Seuerus his sisters sonnes, whom in the yeere of Christ three hundred and six, he elected Cæsars, and after Augusti; which honours the last enioyed not long, for he was slaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeere. And the other, when he had foure yeeres gouerned as Cæsar, and three as Augustus in the East, died at Tharsus in Cilicia.

Constantine the Great elected Cæsar.

(3) And to the lot of Constantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his sonne Constantine (so famous in Christian History) Cæsar, fell Italy, France, Britaine, Spaine, Germany, & most of the Prouinces in Africke: which seeming to him (who rather chose to gouern well then much) too spatious, gaue vp to Galerius all that in Africke, as too remote from the Seat of his residence, and eye of his direction.

Euseb. eccles. hist. l. 8. c. 16.

(4) This good Emperour was for his Palenesse surnamed Chlorus, by birth a Roman, his Father named Eutropius, his Mother Claudia, Neece to the Emperor Claudius. Himselfe had attained the dignitie of a Senator, and was both Wise, Valiant, Noble, and Vertuous; whose parts Eusebius doth thus commend.

Constantius was a man of singular clemency towards men, and piety towards God. Hee did not partake with him in cruelties, whose partaker he was in Soueraignty: neither staining his Raigne with the bloud of the Saints, nor destroying our Churches and places of Prayer, as Maximilianus furiously did, but rather he reuerenced & highly honored those who truly honoured God. For which God so blessed him, that this godly father left a more godly son Constantine, the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

Pompon Lætus.

(5) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that he was of great affabilitie, louing, and gentle, little regarding his Priuate profit, but altogether raigning to inrich his Subiects, and to that end would often say, That it was more behoouefull for the Weale publicke, that the wealth of the Land should be dispersed into the Commons hands, then to lie locked vp in Princes coffers. In which kinde, so auerse he was from all superfluities, that he may be adiudged faultie the other way: for vpon Festiuall dayes, and in his Entertainments of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for such many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furnish his Table and Cupbords.

2 Kin. 10. 20

Constantius policie to trie who were true Christians.

(6) But aboue all other vertues, was his louing countenance and protection to the late persecuted Christians, making his Court their Sanctuary, & his Chappell their Oratory. And to winnow the Chaffe from the Wheat, he vsed the like policy as Iehu King of Israel sometime had done against the Priests of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer sacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to dis-court all such as refused: but contrariwise those that obeyed he put from him, with this reproofe, that he who is disloyall to his God, will neuer be true nor trustie to his Prince.

Constantius his wiues.

(7) When he was first made Cæsar, he was forced to forsake his first wife Helena, by whom he had his vertuous sonne Constantine, and to take Theodora daughter in Law to Maximianus, for a further confirmation of friendship.

Eutropius.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Cælus a British Prince, as saith Eutropius, though Nicephorus make her of Bithynia, and Beda termes her his Concubine, some an Inne-holder, and others for her person and parentage stand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let vs heare the censure of Times chiefe Secre- tary, the learned Cambden in his Britannia. Constantius (saith he) what time he serued in Britaine vnder Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena, daughter of Cœlus or Cœlius a British Prince, on whom he begat that noble Constantine the Great, in Britaine; for so (together with that great Historiographer Baronius) the common opinion of all their Writers with one consent beare witnesse, vnlesse it be one or two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and those dissenting one from the other; & a very learned man, grounding vpon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximianus to put her away, for to marry Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena which in Antique Inscriptiõs is called VENERABILIS & PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian Pietie, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffered, & for finding the saning Crosse is so highly commended of Ecclesiasticall Writers.

Baronius.

A Church builded by Helena in the place where our Sauiour suffered.

And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominie and reproch, Stabularia, because she (a most godly Princesse) sought out the Cribbe or Manger where Christ was borne: and in that place where stood that Hostelrie, founded a Church; for which cause she was by the Enemies of Christian Religion called an Hostesse, and (because such are commonly kind to their Guests) a Concubine also. For whose defence, let the Funerall Oration of Ambrose made vpon the death of Theodosius, answer, wherein he doth rather commend her humilitie, then affirme any such base offices in contempt of her person.)

Ambrose his Oration vpon Theodosius.

They say, that this Lady was at first an Inne-holder or Hostesse, &c. Well (saith he) this good Hostesse Helena hasted to Ierusalem, and sought out the place of our Lords Passiõ, & made diligent search for the Lords Cribbe. This good Hostesse was not ignorant of that Guest which cured the wayfaring mans hurts, that was wounded by Theeues. This good Hostesse chose to be reputed a stable-sweeper, that she might thereby gaine Christ.

And verily she was the mouer and only worker of her husbands conuersion, who casting off all superstitious vanities, willingly acknowledged the onely all-ruling God, suffering the Christians that had bin hid in Caues and Dennes, now to exercise their Deuotions publikely, and both to reedifie the old ruinate Churches, and to erect new.

Ioseph. Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 2. Helena Queen of Adiabena a vertuous woman also.

(9) Of the like Pietie wee reade in a Queene of the like name Helena, Queene of Adiabena (commended by Iosephus) that was a conuert to the Iewish Religion, who comming to Ierusalem to visit the Temple in time of a grieuous Famine, which happened in the dayes of Claudius, sent to Alexandria for great quantitie of Corne, and for dried Figges from Cyprus; which shee very charitably bestowed vpon the poore. And about three stades or furlongs off from Ierusalem, built a Sepulcher with three Pyramides, wherein her selfe and her two sonnes (both Kings) were afterwards interred. But to proceed.

(10) Constantius being here in Britaine, and lately returned from his expedition made against the Caledonians and Picts, fell sicke in the Citie of Yorke, where the Imperiall Throne of his residence was set. At which very time, Constantine his sonne escaping the hands of Gallerius, (with whom he had beene left hostage) hasted from Rome, hauing belaid al the way with Posthorses for the purpose, and left them houghed for feare of pursuit, came with all speed to Yorke, and to his fathers presence, who so much ioyed at his sight, that he sate himselfe vpright vpon his Bed, and in the presence of his Councellors spake as followeth:

Constantine escapeth Galerius.

His preuenting pursuit. He commeth safe to Yorke to his father.

(11) "It now sufficeth, and death is not "fearefull, seeing I shall leaue my vnaccomplished actions to be performed in "thee my Sonne, in whose person I doubt "not but that my memorials shall be re-"tained, as in a Monument of succeeding "fame. What I had intended, but by this "my fatall period left vndone, see thou "performe: let those fruits be ripened "in thee the Branch, that I thy Stock from "a vertuous intent haue had ingrafted al-"wayes in me: that is, gouerne thy Empire "with an vpright Iustice: protect the In-"nocent from the Tyranny of Oppressours; "and wipe away all teares from the eyes "of the Christians; for therein, aboue all "other things, I haue accounted my selfe "the most happie. To thee therefore I "leaue my Diademe, and their Defence, "taking my Faults with me to my Graue, "there to be buried in euerlasting oblivi-"on: but leauing my Vertues (if euer I had "any) to reuiue and liue in thee." With conclusion of which vertuous councell, he tooke his last farewell of his sonne, his friends, and his life, after he had sate Cæsar sixteene yeeres, and Emperour twoans. CHAPTER XLVI.

An. D. 306.

THE Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably, in the presence of his Sonne and sage Councellers: the griefe in the losse of the Sire was no greater then was the ioy conceiued that they had gained the sonne for his Successour: all men reioycing at the good fortune of that iourney, wherein he came to close the eyes of his dying father, and to comfort the sorrow of his mournfull Country-men. For forthwith here in Britaine by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and aduice of Erocus King of the Almans (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight frō Rome) they proclaimed him and all hands Emperour, and successour to that part of the world which his father held. This election was ioyfully ratified by the Senate; and of all other Prouinces so gladly accepted, that they accounted this Iland most happy of all other, whose chance was first to see him their Cæsar, as in these words of the Panegyrist is seen: O fortunate Britaine, and more happie then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Cæsar.

Pangyricke Oration vnto great Britaine.

Eutropius.

Constantines descent.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Britaine, and honourably descended; his father a Roman Senator, Cæsar and Emperour; his mother a Britaine, daughter to Cælas) a Princesse vertuous, wise, chaste, and religious; himselfe in true pietie degenerating from neither. At his first entrance hee pursued the reliques of the warre, which his father had begunne against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britaines that were more remote, & Inhabitants of those Ilands, that are witnesses (saith one) of the Sunnes set or going downe.

Enseb. in vita Constantini.

(3) Maxentius the sonne of Maximian Herculius, who at the death of Constantius was proclaimed Augustus by the tumultuous Pretorian Souldiers at Rome, and Romulus his son (whose face we haue here with his fathers from both their monies expressed) was created his Cæsar (the way to that Seat of Maiestie whereunto he had too hastily and most vnduely climed: for now this Vsurper by his Necromancies, Adulteries, Persecutions, and Murders, was growne so vntollerable and odious, that the Senate sent to Constantine, crauing his ayd and redresse; who sore lamenting the sores of the Empire, and the ease of the Christians, first wrote but that taking no effect, prepared his Forces against Maxentius.

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretences (which by the sequell is more probable) tooke great offence at his son Maxentius vnsufferable outragiousnesse; and vnder colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in in-law Constantine that had married his daughter Fausta, and notwithstanding his faire pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly he tampered with Fausta to make away her husband. But the good Lady well knowing the bond of a child is great, but greater the loue of a wife, reuealed his treachery to Constantine, who caused him thereupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloudy a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no way-degenerating sonne, against whom he prepared his forces: and drawing Licinius Gouernour of Sclauonia, who was made Cæsar, to his side, by giuing him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinary descent, though Galienus Maximinus had made him in Illyria his Copartner in the East) hasted towards Rome with an Host of ninety thousand foot, & eight thousand horse; leuied out of Britaine, France, and Germany.

Maximianus put to death by Constantine.

(4) But knowing well that successe in warre dependeth more on diuine assistance then humane strength, and doubtfull what God he should in this blessed enterprise inuocate for ayde, (for as yet he was not fully setled in the Christiã Faith, though the gods of the Gentiles he obserued altogether deceitfull) cast vp in this his holy meditation his eyes Eastward to heauen, and had by diuine ordinance presented to him in obiect the signe of a Crosse, wherein were Starres (as letters) so placed, that visibly might be read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as diuers Authors report.

Yet are there some from the testimony of Eusebius himselfe, vnto whom this blessed man did declare his vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Character of the name of Christ (to which the reuerse of Decentius hereafter expressed, as of many others may adde much probabilitie) rather then either of these, although Tertullian and S. Ierome affirme that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Sauiour died: but this as a question beyond my iudgement or intention, I leaue to these learned Diuines and others, who haue laboured that subiect with curious search.

(5) This miraculous signe promising Victory, and that (saith Eusebius) not in an Inscription onely, but by voyce of Angels, was so comfortable to Constantine, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him & his victorious Army, in place of the Imperiall Standard, the forme of this vision imbrodered with gold and stones of greatest price. And as one armed from heauen, proceeded against his hellish aduersary.

Constantines repose.

Maxentius as much depending vpon his Sorcerers, was no lesse assured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a stratagem of warre, he framed a deceitfull Bridge ouer the Riuer Tiber neere to Pons Miluius, to intrap Constantine: but ioyning battel, and ouerlaid with strokes, retired and fled, and (whether for haste, or through forgetfulnesse) tooke ouer the same Bridge, which suddenly failing vnder him, he was with many more drowned, and Constantine remained Victor. In memory whereof, he caused a triumphall Arch to be erected in the midst of Rome, wherein his Statue was imbossed, holding in his right hand a Crosse, according to the fashion of that which he had seene in the heauens: and vpon ancient inscription in memory of this Victory, this we finde engraued: INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS REMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS: Thus: By instinct of the Diuine power, with great magnanimitie and helpe of his Army in a lawfull warre, he reuenged the cause of the Common-wealth, as well on the Tyrant himselfe, as on his whole Faction all at once. With the like successe had he warred against the Frankners in Batania, whose Victory was likewise stamped in gold, wherein is a woman sitting vnder a Trophey, and leaning her head vpon a Crosse-bow, with this Inscription, FRANCIA.

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he inforced this champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, with which he met Licinius in Hungary, where he gaue him a great ouerthrow. But hee eſcaping to Bizantium, in Aſia the leſſe, ioyned againe battell, and was there taken Priſoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Conſtantia, had his life ſpared, & was confined within the Citie Nicomedia; where for his treaſons afterwards, he and his ſon Licinianus that ſomewhat ſuruiued him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifeſtly appeared, and the progreſſe of the Goſpell paſſed vntroubled.

Licinius put to death at Nicomedia, and his ſonne after. Anno 326.

(8) For now (ſaith our Gyldas) no ſooner was the blaſting tempeſt and ſtorme of Perſecution blowne ouer, but the faithfull Chriſtians, who in time of trouble and danger, had hidden themſelues in woods & deſerts, and in ſecret caues, being come abroad to open ſight, reedified the Churches ruinated to the very ground. The temples of holy Martyrs they founded, and erected (as it were) the Banners of victory in euery place, celebrating feſtiuall holy dayes, and with pure hearts and mouthes performing the ſacred ceremonies: for the which bleſſedneſſe, he euer after had the attributes aſcribed vnto him, of moſt bleſſed Emperour, moſt pious, happy Redeemer of Romes Citie, Founder of Peace, Reſtorer of Rome, and of the whole World, moſt great, inuincible Auguſtus, Sacred, Diuine, and of ſacred memory, &c. Howbeit, for admitting theſe prayſes, as it ſhould ſeeme, he is taxed by Eutropius and Victor of pride; as alſo cruelty, for putting to death Criſpus his ſon (by Mineruina his Concubine; whom he had made Cæſar, and permitted to ſtampe theſe monies here vnder inſerted)

(9) Touching Conſtantines affayres in this Iland, it appeareth by the laſt Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Country, ſome aſpiring minde taking aduantage of his abſence, in other Warres, perſwaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Whereupon once againe hee addreſſed himſelfe with his Army to the reeſtabliſhing of the Ilands ſubiection: and paſſing (ſaith Euſebius) ouer into Britaine, incloſed on euery ſide within the bankes of the Ocean, he conquered the ſame. The ioyfull memory of this expedition is regiſtred to poſteritie vpon his Coine ſet in the entrance of this Chapter, inſcribed Aduentus Auguſti, and by theſe Letters, P. L. N. the place of the Mint to be at London.

(10) After this ſaith the ſame Author) he began to compaſſe in his minde other parts of the World, to the end he might come in time to ſuccour thoſe that wanted helpe: and when he had furniſhed his Army with milde and modeſt inſtructions of pietie, he inuaded Britaine, that hee might likewiſe inſtruct thoſe that dwell inuironed round about with the waues of the Ocean bounding the Sunnes ſetting as it were with thoſe coaſts. And of the Political gouernment therein by him altered, let it not ſeeme offenſiue that I, who know and profeſſe mine own weake ſight in moſt of theſe matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright ſhining Lampe of that Illuſtrious Antiquary, who ſaith:

Cambden in his Britannia.

(11) About this time (ſaith he) as euidently appeareth by the Code of Theodoſius, Pacatianus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Prouince had no more Propretors, nor Lieutenants, but in ſtead therof, was a Vicegerent ſubſtituted. And againe, Seeing that Conſtantine altered the forme of the the Roman Gouernment, it shall not be impertinent to note summarily in what sort Britain was ruled vnder him; and in the next succeeding ages.

He ordained foure Præfects of the Prætorii, to wit, of the East, of Illyricum, of Italy, and of Gaule: two Leaders or Commanders of the Forces, the one of footmen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they termed Præsentales. For ciuill gouernment there ruled Britaine, the Præfect of the Prætorium or Grand Seneschall in Gaule, and vnder him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title, Spectabilis; that is, notable or remarkable: him obeyed respectiuely to the number of the Prouinces two Consular deputies, and three Præsidents, who had the hearing of ciuill and criminall causes.

For military affaires, there ruled the Leader or Commander of the footmen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earles or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast along Britaine; & the Duke of Britain, stiled euery one Spectabilis.

Amianus Marcel.

The Earle Lieutenant of Britaine seemeth to haue ruled the Inland parts of the Iland, who had with him seuen Companies of footmen, and nine coronets or troopes of horse.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast: who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, & is named by Amianus Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Seacoast, had seuen companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke or Generall of Britain, who defended the Marches against the barbarians, had the cõmand of thirty & eight garrison forts, herein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteen thousand foot, & nine hundred horse.

So that in those daies (by Pancirolus account) Britaine maintained nineteene thousand, two hundred footmen, and seuenteene hundred horsemen, or thereabout in ordinary.

Besides all these, the receiuer of the Emperors Finances or publike reuenewes: the Prouost of the Emperors Treasures in Britaine, & the procurator of the Drapery in Britain; in the which the cloths of the Prince & Souldiers were wouen: and the Count also of priuate reuenewes had his Rationall or Auditory of priuate State in Britain: to say nothing of the sword-fence-schoole Procurator in Britain (whereof an old inscription maketh mention) and of other officers of inferiour degrees.

(12) After the setling of these affaires, to the end that he might with the more facilitie bridle the vntamed Persians that seldome were in quiet, he remoued the Imperiall seat of his Residence into the East; for now Galerius and Licinius both dead, the rent and diuided state of the Roman Empire was in him vnited: and purposing to build there a Citie, as an eternall Monument of his name, he chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia: but whiles they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle scouping at the line, flew with it ouer the Sea towards Byzantiũ in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent Citie, naming it New Rome (as appeareth by an inscription of his statue) In imitation whereof, he circulated seuẽ hils with a Wall for Height, Thicknesse, and Beautie, the faireſt in the world: and not onely erected Temples, Towers, and most stately Palaces himselfe, but by his publike Edicts, commanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments and memorable Edifices, beseeming the Maiestie of so glorious a foundation.

Sabellicus.

A Iewish Doctor thus described this Citie in an Epistle which himselfe deliuered to our English Ambassador, remaining in Constantinople in Anno 1594.

(13) Hither also from Rome he caused to be brought many renowned Monumẽts of Antiquities, as the famous goddesse Pallas of old Troy, the Image of Apollo in brasse of an vnmeasurable bignesse; the Statues of Iuno, Minerua, Venus, and the like: whereupon Hierome saith; That Constantine to inrich this one Citie, impouerished all others in the Empire: and other Writers which saw it in the perfection of beautie, report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods then the dwelling place for Earthly men. Herein also was built the Proud Palace of that Publike Library, wherein were contained one hundred twentie thousand of the chiefest Written Bookes; and in the midst thereof were the Guts of a Dragon, in length one hundred twentie Foote, on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Iliads of Homer. The New Name of this new Citie lasted not long; for the affection of all men to the Founder, affoorded it rather the name of Constantinople; as a trophy then of this Emperors renowne, though now a brand of infamy to another of that name, who lost it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke: and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one name, so had Old Rome in Augustus her pitch of height, and in Augustulus her period.

(14) He drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Prouinces, as well in Germany & Gallia, as in Britaine: from whence he brought (saith Malmesbury) a great power of British Souldiers, through whose industry and forward seruice, hauing obtained Triumphant Victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past seruice, and had performed the painefull parts of Souldiers their full time, he planted in a certaine part of Gaule Westward, vpon the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posteritie remaining, are wonderfully growne euen to a mightie people; in manners and language somewhat degenerate from our Britaines. In which his doings, he laid open the Prouinces to the irruptions of their Enemies, and is therefore by Zosimus hardly censured, as being the onely man that by this meanes first subuerted the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine, the Picts and other their wonted Enemies had the bolder and easier entrance into the more ciuill parts of this Iland, wherby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a prey of Conquest to the Saxons, as shall be shewed in due place.

(15) But howsoeuer his policy failed, carried (as it seemeth) by a Diuine inspiration to leaue Rome; yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee so laid the foundation of the Christians securitie, that the same hath stood vnder the protection of Princes euer since, euen vnto this day. And albeit that many Cæsars his successors, haue often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the sharpe instruments of Heretikes dangerously haue vndermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous assaies, and stood in the strength that this Emperour first laid it.

Constantine the establisher of Christianitie.

(16) And vpon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregated three hundred and eighteene Christian Bishops in the City Nice in Thracia, where himselfe was present, and also President of the same Councell (though now his Beadsmen (the Popes) put him & his Successors from that right: and as another Moses, he then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly gouernment of the Church in that Primitiue age.

(17) But as the cleere Sunne hath his set, and the fairest day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his liuing glory shall be endlesse: for intending a voyage against the Persians, he fell grieuously sicke, and counselled by his Physitians to be carried vnto Nicomedia, a Citie in Bythinia, to the Hot Bathes that naturally there sprang (which caused some erroneously to write that he became a Leaper) he died on the way neer to the place, and in great deuotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, May 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirtie seauen; of his happie victorious raigne thirtie one, and of his age sixtie fiue; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apostles that himselfe had therein founded.

(18) Eusebius writing this good Emperours life, saith that he deferred his Baptisme vntill his old age, in desire that he might receiue it in Iordan, where our Sauiour himselfe was baptized; yet others thinke that he was baptized with his Son Crispus, what time he created him his Cæsar; for the Celebration whereof, he caused a most sumptuous Font to be made in Rome; which Platina & Sabellicus affirme to haue continued to their times. And the ingenuitie of the same Sabellicus is much to be approued, in that speaking of Constantines Donation, which some so much vaunt of (though the vanitie of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) he acknowledgeth (himselfe being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which he followed, and so leaueth it to the Patronage of those Craftsmen, out of whose forges it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Empire as Augusti (with distast of the eldest) his three Sonnes, Constantine, Constantius, and Constance, whom before he had made Cæsars, and designed by Testament Delmatius, the sonne of Anniballianus (his brother) Cæsar: and therefore we haue inserted his money in ranke of those that succeeded this great and glorious Emperour.

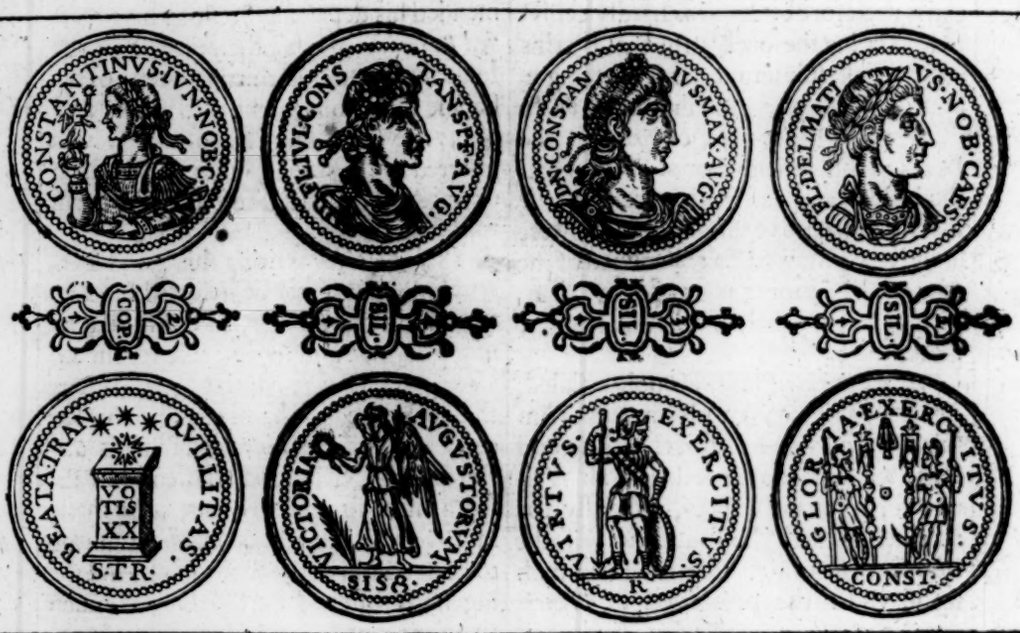
CHAPTER XLVII.



An. Do. 337

FOR the Empire being diuided among these Brethren, Constitinus the eldest, whose portion was Britaine, France, Spaine, and part of Germany, tooke himselfe wronged in this partition; whereas Constans his second brother had Italy, Africa, Slauonia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Constantius the youngest possessed Thracia, Syria, Mesopotamia and Egypt, Prouinces much greater in his sight, then his owne seemed to be; and therfore at last ambitiously he attempted to inlarge his vpon the Frontires of his brother Constans, at that time in Dacia, and in warres against the Gothes, who there also inuaded his Territories, but was met with and slaine by a Captaine of his brothers, neere to the Citie Aquileia in Italy, when he had held his Seigniories the terme of three yeeres.

(2) Hereupon Constans grew exceedingly proud, and seising his deceased brothers Prouinces, ioined them vnto his own Possessions, and with his brother Constantius came into this Iland. This Battaile, and their arriuall here by the words of Iulius Firmius, chanced in the winter season: for (saith he, speaking to these Emperours) you haue subdued vnder your Oares the swelling and raging waues of the British Ocean, euen in the deepe of Winter; a thing hitherto neuer seene before.

Cassiod trip. Hist.

And the Britaines were sore afraid to behold ỹ vnexpected face of their Emperour. This Constans was he that called a Councel to Sardica against the Arrians, whither were assembled three hundred Bishops, and among them, some of the British, as formerly we haue mẽtioned. But this Prince being youthfull, cast away all care of the Empire; and drowned in his owne pleasures, followed ill counsel, (the vsual way to Princes ruines.) Thus grown grieuous to the Prouinces, and nothing acceptable to the Souldiers, was by Magnetius a Captaine of his own slaine, as he was hunting neere the Castle of S. Helens, situate amongst the Tapori, a Spanish people vnder the Peren Mountaines. And as hence this Murderer of his Soueraigne Lord and Master, was branded with the name of Taporus porus, so in this Emperour there murdered was fulfilled a prophecy, which said that he should dye in his Grandmothers Lap.

Amian lib. 20. cap. 11.

Olympias the widdow of this Constans was giuen to Arsace King of Armenia, by Constantius his brother, to be a bond and purchase of his surer friendship, of which his neede was much, as the times required: for after the death of Constance, one Vetranio was proclaimed Emperor by the Pannoniã Army, though shortly disrobed, & sent to end his decrepit age in a priuate fortune. Neophanus the nephew of Constans by his sister Eutropia, at Rome by the abiect Ront was saluted Augustus; which he enioyed not much aboue twenty daies being suppressed by Magnentius, who had now made the trunck of Majesty, his Soueraignes body, the Basse, whereby hee meant with Decentius and Desiderius, his two brethren to ascend the Throne.

Fl pop. Nephanum p. F. Aug.

(3) Simon Dunelmensis sayth, that Great Constantine at his departure from Britain, left one Octauius to gouerne the Land, who shortly rebelled, & after diuers conflicts was slaine by Traherne, Commander of a Roman Legion. Galfridus makes the sayd Octauian a Britain, and will haue him to raigne with great Victories ouer this Iland the space of fifty four yeers, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinians Rule in Rome: so farre doe our British Historians differ from the Romans. But from them most certaine it is, that Magnẽtius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Leti in France, inuested himselfe into the Imperiall Dignity, vsurping France, Spaine, and Britaine, thus stamping the face of himselfe & his brother Decentius, by him made Cæsar at Millan, vpon the currant Monies of such reuolted Prouinces as he vsurped.

And did for three yeers bandy against Constantius, though with some vnequall successe: but lastly despairing to vphold his owne greatnesse, murdered himselfe at Lyons in Gallia, as his brother vpõ newes thereof, did with a haltar in the same Country. For this euent (no other occasion mouing) Constantius both shut the Temple of Ianus in Rome, as a token of an vniuersall Peace; & gloriously triumphed with more then a vsuall aspect.

(4) At this time the General of the Army in Britain was one Gracianus the father of Valentinian the Emperor, by birth an Hungarian, & so strong of limme, that no fiue mẽ could pul a rope out of his hand with all their force; whereof he was surnamed Funarius, the Roper. This man giuing entertainment to Magnentius, was condemned in confiscation of all his goods by Constantius that now ruled sole Emperor, vnto whom also the Britains submitted themselues, and whose Deputy after Gracianus, was aged Martin, a man (no doubt) vertuous and vpright, as he witnessed by his death: for Constantius, whose base and distrustfull heart feared the wagging of euery leafe, by the slaughter of many guiltlesse, sought to make himselfe secure: and egged on by his Flatterers, (to serue their purposes) sent one Paulus a Notary into Britaine, to apprehend them that had ayded Magnentius.

Amian Marcel. lib. 14 cap 4.

(5) The sayd Notary was a Spaniard, of a pestilent wit and subtilty, especially in finding out all quirkes and deuices to endanger mens estates: whose businesse being now to apprehend and bring away such Martiall men as had entred action in the foresayd conspiracies, he vnder that pretence drew into danger many that were guiltlesse, and the Emperours true Subiects: some of which he imprisoned, others he tormented, and many with Manacles & Chaines so bruised that therefore he was called Catena. Old Martin the Deputy, much lamenting their miseries, besought the Spaniard to surcease, & not with the Offenders thus to punish the Innocent; wherat the proud Catchpole so much disdained, that he threatned and sought to bring Martin before the Counsell, and that in bands in manner of a Traytor; which so much incensed the aged man, that with his dagger he assailed him; but perceiuing the wound hee gaue was not deadly, he stabbed the same into his owne side, and thereof presently dyed: vnfortunate in this fact, but otherwise a most righteous man (sayth Amianus) that

Amian. lib. 20. cap. 1.

(6) But beſides theſe their diſtreſſes, the outrodes of the Scots and Picts, breaking into the Marches of the Britains, ſore moleſted their peace: for redreſſe whereof, Iulian the Cæſar wintring at Paris, and diſtracted into ſundry thoughts, was afraid in perſon to paſſe thoſe Seas himſelf and to leaue Gaule without a Ruler, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when the Almans had ſtirred vp a moſt cruell warre; wherfore he ſent Lupicinus at that time Colonell of the Infantery, and Maſter of the Armory, to withſtand their fury; a warlike man certes, and skilfull in feats of Armes but withall proud of heart and countenance, looking high, and ſpeaking bigge, and in geſture demeaning himſelfe in his charge as an Actor vpon a Stage, & otherwiſe ſo qualified, that men doubted a long time whether he were more Couetous or Cruell. He from * Bononia imbarked al his men, and with a good gale arriued in the Hauen* Rutupi, marching in all haſt to * Lundinium, that from thence, after aduice taken, according to the quality of the buſineſſe, hee might make more haſte to come into the field, and giue battle. But with what ſucceſſe his affaires afterwards proceeded, I finde not recorded: and therefore I returne againe to the Emperour Conſtantius.

(7) Flauius Claudius Conſtantius Gallus his coſen german he elected Cæſar, permitted him to ſtampe this money, and linckt him in mariage with his ſiſter Conſtantia. But he, deſigned to gouerne the Eaſt, and make good thoſe Frontiers againſt the Perſians, forgot the duty of his charge, and gaue himſelfe vp at Antioch to al licentious luſts & cruelties: of which whē Conſtantius (infected afore with ſome iealouſie of his ambition) was informed, he ſo plotted, that this loſt man, drowned in his owne vicious ſecurity, was ſurpriſed, and with his hands bound backward (like a Felon) giuen vp to the common Headſman for execution. His brother Iulianus was then made Cæſar, and this Gallus executed.

Iulianus made Cæſar.

Emperours other ſiſter Helena beſtowed vpon him, whoſe Victories againſt the Germans and Gaules gained him ſuch applauſe, that he was againſt his will by the Souldiers elected Auguſtus, and made Conſort with Conſtantius in Power Imperiall.

Iuliani Epiſtola

(8) Whoſe fortunes thus ſticking in a tumultuous State (for, with others, Nigrinianus whoſe conſecrated memory is left to poſterity vpon this money, attempted the diſquiet of this Emperour, by an ambitious affectation of rule, that was both ſhort & fatall to him) did plainly foreſhew, that neither his Raigne nor life would laſt long.

For beſides the affections of the time that then followed that new riſen Starre Iulian, his nightly viſions and imagined apparitions did both terrifie and appall his minde; for as he thought, his fathers Ghoſt preſented vnto him, a Babe of an ingenious countenance, which ſtrooke the Ball (that the Romans call Tufa, a Globe borne only by a Monarch) out of his right hand, betokening nought els but a change of State. Which howſoeuer his diuiners interpreted for pleaſing things, yet himſelfe thought his owne Genius did ſtill follow him, in a forlorne, poore, and mournfull habit.

Conſtantius apparition.

(9) For all theſe dumps, Conſtantius meant this new Election to diſauow: and Iulian for his part reſolued in point of honour to maintaine and vphold. Whereupon warres prepared, Conſtantius ſet forward to encounter him, and comming to Tharſus, from Antioch in Syria, fell there ſicke of a feuer, which ſtill increaſed as he further trauelled, and in the borders of Cilicia, at the place called Mopſus Welles, ſituated at the foote of Mount Taurus, dyed the third day of November, the yeere of Chriſt by Ieromes account, three hundred ſixty foure: by others, three hundred ſixty one; when he had ruled twenty foure yeeres, and liued forty and a few moneths, as Amianus Marcellinus, and Pomponius Lætus affirme. But Socrates and Zoſimus ſay, that hee liued

Amian lib. 26. cap. 9.

He is neither accounted with the best nor worst Emperors, his Vertues seeming to hold scoale with his Vices: temperate, courteous, liberall, and affable; not eloquent, yet desirous to speake well; blunt witted, yet a great fauorer of learning; a most skilful Archer, & apt to take paines, but withall very suspitious; led by Flatterers, and most cruell to the accused, and in exacting importable Tributes, drew more hatred vpon his head then money into his coffers. But especially is he stained with the heresie of the Arrians, for whose sake hee banished many of the Christians, & amongst thē Athanasius, that excellent light of the Catholike Church. In fauour of those heretickes, hee caused to be summoned 400 western Bishops vnto the Councel of Ariminum, wherof three are reported tocome out of Britaine. And he is by Amianus his Lsfewriter, condemned for mingling foolish doting superstitions, with the sincere doctrin of the Christian Religion, giuen rather to a more intricate search therein, then to settle his opinions vpon gravity: and stirring vp schismes and discords in maintaining of words and contentious disputations, which as they spread more and more, gat wing euen vnto this Iland of Britain, as by the words of our lamenting Historian Gyldas is seene. When (sayth he) the swe ete concent of Christ the head, and his members the body, had continued vntill such time, as that deadly & perfidious Arrians me like to a pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the Sea, casting vp her venome vpon vs, caused brethren dwelling together, tobe disioyned piteously one from another. And thus the way as it were being made ouer the Ocean, all other cruell & fell Beasts wherso euer, shaking out of their horrible mouthes the deadly poyson of euery heresie, inflicted the deadly stings and wounds of their teeth, vpon this our Country, desirous euermore to heare some noueltie.

of his own imperfect constitution, & the bloudy iealousie of his ruling kinsmen (not long before the fatall ruine of his father) for being too neere allyed to their Crownes.

Meane he was of stature, yet carrying from head to foote a just proportion and vniform knitting of his lineaments, wherby hee had agility and strength: big and broad his shoulders, his necke fat, bearing his head forward; louely and gracefull was the cast of his quicke and cleere eye, straight his nose, & no feature of his face amisse, but the greatnesse of his mouth, and the parting of his nether lippe; the soft haire of his head he wore in a decent length, and his rough beard hee cut in a poynted fashion.

His education Miso Iul.Emp.

(2) His education was vnder many masters, of which Mardonius a Scythian Eunuch was the first. From him he was sent to the publike Schoole at Constantinople, wher of Nicocles the Lacedemõ, he learned his Grammar, & of Ecebolius the Sophister his Rhetorike; and of both of them (as Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia hath it) the Christian Religion, in which his delight was such, that he betooke him to the function of a Deacon, reading in publike to the people the sacred Bookes; and aymed at no further marke of greatnesse then the reputation of a holy man: led on with the loue of knowledge, he went to the Schooles of Nicodemia, wher, of Iamblicus, who succeeded Porphyry in the Chaire; he learned the Philosophy of Aristotle and Plato. There bewitched at length with the fame of Libanius Eloquence, though detesting his religion, from reading in priuate study his prophane labours, hee grew a publike hearer of his muectiue Lectures: and imitating at first in exercise of wit onely this Rhetoricians forme of declaming, hee grew in the end the profanest Railer, & deadliest Enemy of all other himselfe against the Church. And to fill vp this vessell of iniquity, Maximus the onely Impostor and Magitian then of the world, (worthily after for his impious doctrine put by Valentinian to the sword) must come to Nicomedia. From him did Iulian learne such Astrology as setteth Natiuities, and such Magicke as inuoketh Spirits. And here was the schoole of this mans Error, and Mistris of his Impiety. The seedes of whose Nature and Education hauing thus obserued, let vs search with an impartiall eye into his manners and conditions, & see what vertue was in the fruit.

Socrat.l.3 c.1.

(3) His temperance is commended to vs with admiration. He slept little, & could awake at pleasure: his bed was euer with the hardest, and his dyet of the meanest meat, and the moderatest measure, wherby he neuer but once, & that by accident disburdened his stomacke by vomit; and would often say that it was the safety of his life, that he neuer had any war with his belly. Such was his chastity, that hauing lost at once in France Helena his beloued wife, and her Infant, his onely Son, he neuer so much as in suspect, had an incontinent desire. And therefore of all the Persian beauties taken in those warres, as the richest spoyles, nec contrectare aliquam voluit nec videre: Neither suffer in his Army either Cookes or Barbers, as being deliciarum atq; intemperantiæ ministros.

And when the action was performing; similior sum detestanti eos ludos quàm spectanti. Yet doth Marcellinus tax him of much verbosity and affectation of vaine glory. And Gregory Nazianzen charging him with intemperate passion as vncõstability, sayth; That by his ranging and furious aspect, his vnsteady and halting pace, his steering looke, and immoderate laughter, Talem ante opera vidi qualem in operibus cognoui.

(4) The loue of Iustice in this Prince is remembred to vs in his rules of DIRECTION: for hee so amended the Lawes Ambagibus circumcisis, that the Iudges might cleerely see, Quid juberent fieri, quid vetarent: and in his EXAMPLE for imitation. For when to an innocẽt deniall before him, Delphidius the Orator inueighed saying; Nocens esse poterit quisquam si negare suffecerit: himselfe replied, Et quis innocens esse poterit si accusâsse sufficit? and so discharged the party. As for his clemency and charity, which ought to attend the sword and Scepter of a Soueraigne, since the one is Magnum timoris remedium, and the other will be, post cineres tributum; Nebridius and Lucillianus are Registers of the one, whom notwithstanding their conspiracies in fauor of Constantius, hee not onely pardoned, but defended with perill of his owne person from the furies of his owne followers. And for the other those his letters to Arsacius is a sure record: Let there bee in the Cities of your charg, many Hospitals erected, that the want of the the wayfaring may be releeued by our benignity: and not of them only of our Religion, but of all the rest: for it suites not well with the goodnes of our Gouernment, that when the Iewes permit none of theirs to beg, & the wicked Galileans releeue not only theirs, but ours; that ours should be disconsolate of other helpe.

(5) Some haue blemished his bounty with the brand of vaine glory: thus did the Antiochiās for depressing so much the reasonable price of Graine in their Markets, by a profuse expence of his owne Treasure, gaining thereby at first onely the applause of the light multitude, after which he hunted, and drawing on in the end a miserable dearth, through the licentious excesse of their improuidence: which often happeneth.

(6) And as the banishment of Palladias into Britaine vpon a weake suspition; Taurus to Vircillum, in whō the eie of Iustice could find no skarre; & to death Vrsulus, with Pigmeus (the first his Treasurer, that had spent with him and on him his owne meanes, when being Cæsar, hee had little of his owne: the other the guide of his youth, and to whom he truely ought the greatest part of his goodnesse) may iustly staine him with lawlesse seuerity, and vngratefull cruelty; so may his malicious spirit against the Christians, (howsoeuer masking in more Art then many that went before him) set him vp in the ranke and top of the greatest Persecutors. And although there be some passages in his Gouernment more easie then in some others that may imply a gentle disposition towards thē, sometimes taking the gods to witnesse, that the Galileans (for so he named the Christians) should not vndergo the least iniury, neither be led to Pagan sacrifice or forced to any thing beyond the compasse of their owne contents: and that hee not onely reuoked the Edict of Constantine the Arrian Emperour, wherby those holy men stood long exiled: but taking the aduantage of an vprore begun by the Arrians (their Enemies) at Edissa, seised vpon their goods, swolne too great in number and fortune by the gracious aspect of his Predecessors, (to whō hee dissembled himselfe a Christian:) yet did he whiles hee had in his owne hands the reine of Gouernment, by all his actions and ends, declare himselfe an heauy opposite vnto them. Somtimes by allurements to assay to corrupt them; sometimes by a subtill siding with one faction of the Church, as he did with the Catholikes against the Arrians, to counterpoise their power, vt securiùs regnaret, that by such licence of sedition, Non timeret vnanimantem plebem, hee need not feare the power of their vnity, as himself professed. (7) From this vnfortunate plot of earthly policy (but with worse succesſe) he incited the Iewes to reedifie the Temple at Ierusalem, and renew their Sacrifice, remitting to them their debt of Tribute, and vowing that at his return from Persia he would visit that holy Citie, and (as he sayth to them) vt vnà vobiscum in ea Deo optimo gratias agam; well beleeuing that by raising such an opposite to the Christians, he should suppresse their increase, & annihilate their prophecy of Ierusalems desolatiō. To repaire those cursed walles against the prouidence of Diuine Iustice, Alipius of Antioch, that had been Gouernour of Britain, was sent: but his indeuor, saith Amianus, & the worke of all his Ministers, was interrupted by fearefull flaming balles of fire, which issued from the Earth neer vnto those foundatiōs, consuming very many of the Iewes & workmē; by reason whereof this Element still giuing fresh assault on them, the place became vnaccessible, & the enterprise giuen ouer: so vaine it is for Man to striue against the decreed purpose of God. And it is by others affirmed, that at the same time an Earthquak so shook those Foundations of the Temple which were left by Titus vntouched, that one stone thereby was not left standing vpon another, but were all laid leuell with the ground: by which miraculous sights many Iewes were turned to the embracing of the Christian Faith, vpon whose garments fell formes of Crosses, which shined as the beames of the Sunne, neither could they by any meanes be washed or wiped away. Alipius that had been chiefe in this businesse, was afterward confined into Banishment, with the losse of his goods, by Valens vpon suspition of Treason. And thus farre of Iulians veiled hatred: now of his open actions of despight against the Christians.

Many lawes he made againſt them, and many rights of Subiects hee tooke from them. By Edict he forbad the Chriſtians the publike Schooles & ſtudy of the Arts and Tongues; Ieſting away the reaſon of his iniuſtice with ſcoffes, as hee did the reſt; ſaying, that Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and Plato, (who muſt bee their guides in ſuch liberall learnings) adoring Mercurie and the other gods, hee held it abſurd that they ſhould reade and learne of their Bookes, that loath and raile at their Religion.

(9) The equity of this extended power may appeare by Marcellinus cenſure, a man of his owne Religion, who of it ſayth, Inclemens obruendum perenni ſilentio; Let the Edict be dambd to eternal ſilence. When hee ſeized vpon the goods of the Chriſtians, which was often, and vpon weake pretences, he vſed to inuert the Letter of their own Doctrine, in warrant of his foule act, ſaying that he did it, vt facilius in regnum cælorum veniant. When he had diſabled the Chriſtians of all command, either in the Field or Commonwealth, (as he did Iouinian, Valentinian & Valens, after Emperors) he would ſay, he did it becauſe their Goſpell taketh from them Poteſtatem Gladij. And whereſoeuer any poore Chriſtian implored the hand of Iuſtice againſt wrong & violence, they returned with no better redreſſe, then that it was the rule of their Religion, perferre iniurias, it was the duty of their profeſſion to beare al iniuries. And although moſt Authors agree that hee ſtained not his gouernment with the bloud of any Catholike, well knowing that gore of Perſecution is the ſeed of the Goſpell; yet ſome affirme that when Apolloes Oracle, neere Antioch, had loſt his power of anſwer, by the holy preſence of Babillaes body (there martyred and intombed) and that the Chriſtians in remooving it away, ſung ſolemnly the Pſalme, Let all them bee confounded which worſhip grauen Images: this Emperour (although the Act was his direction, though not the order) grew ſo inraged, that he put then many Chriſtians to the ſword.

(10) Of the prudence and learning of this man there be many notable monuments remaining: for in all the courſes of his life he did rather labour to cõtent the parts of his vnderſtanding, then of his ſenſuality, often being heard to ſay, Turpe eſſet ſapienti, cùm habeat animum, captare laudes ex corpore: and therefore writing to Ecdicius, Prefect of Ægypt, to help him to the Bookes of George Biſhop of Alexandria, hee ſayth, Where others delighted in Horſe and Hawkes, I haue beene from my infancy inflamed with the loue of Books. Many works there were of his own pen, though now raked vp in the ruines of the time.

(13) His fortitude appeareth in the proceſſe of his Martiall Actions. At three and twenty yeeres hee was made by Conſtantine his nephew Cæſar, matched to his ſiſter Helena, and ſent in perſon to reſtreine thoſe barbarous Nations that had forced in vpon the Roman Limits. But whether this imploiment was grounded vpō the Emperours owne feare to aduenture his perſon againſt theſe Sauages; a deſire to nurture this mere Scholer his brother in law in more princely manners, who then was rude; or to expoſe him (in reſpect of ſome iealouſie in State) to an aſſured perill: it remaineth doubtfull. Onely himſelfe ſayth, that he that beſtowed his Title of Cæſar, libenter dabat; & qui accepit, omnino recuſabat: for in it hee gained nothing but vt occupatior interiret, taking this his expedition againſt thoſe Inrodes, as a baniſhment into the Hercinian Deſert, vt tanquam venator cum feris bellaret: and beleeuing himſelfe rather thereby called out to an expected death, then intended honour. But this man then neither of opinion or hope, and who ſhould haue ſeemed to haue effected a point of excellent ſeruice, if hee had no more but defended the frontiers, & repelled the Enemies, did by his valour performe no leſſe the deeds of admiration.

(14) He ſent to Rome Chonodomarius & Badoncarius, two of their greateſt Kings, as ſpoyles to adorne the Trophey, and attend the tryumph of Conſtantius. He forced on euery ſide thoſe to feare his power, that had ſo long been fearefull to the Roman Empire. And had he returned home, borne vp onely with the merit of this his ſeruice, and opinion of the world, & not beene blowne beyond the bounds of his old moderation by a new deſire, he had eſcaped the imputation of ambition and treachery, and beene eſteemed a iuſt ſucceſſor, againſt whom he is deemed now an vniuſt vſurper. But it may be ſaid that it was a diuine power that inſpired it, and a ſtrong hand that inforced him to it: for from aboue the Porch of his entrance, into one of the regained Cities the Wreath of Laurell (reſerued an ornament of that place) fell in wonder vpon his head. The Genius of Rome in many apparitions chiding and reprehending his ſlow deſire to affect the Empire, and reſtore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the gods to witneſſe his vnwillingneſſe, and the publike proteſtation he made againſt it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Army ſaluted Auguſtus. And although by the great prouiſion made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Army againſt the plots of Conſtantius (that grew now enuious of his fortune,) hee may ſeeme to haue intended the ruine of his Soueraigne, yet doth he by the gods of his greateſt confidence, Iupiter and the Sunne, proteſt; Quod Conſtantium occidere nunquam optauit, imò ne id accideret expotauit.

(15) But Conſtantius ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Pithoniſt had deluded with the hope of Perſia, telling him that his fortunes ſhould be as his feature, like Great Alexander, bred in him a thirſty deſire after the ſurname Perſicus: whereupon he prepared an army for this expedition, & ſeeking the fauour of his gods the Moone, Fortune, and Mars, embrued their Altars with the Bloud of an hundred Buls at once; though many ominous ſignes, as they were interpreted by his Philoſophers and Southſayers, forbad the ſame. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that ſwallowed vp the Citie of Nicomedia. Riuers likewiſe are ſayd to ſtand drie, euen in the heart of winter; & Springs forgetting their vſuall boylings, yeelded not foorth their wonted waters: yea and if we will beleeue the reporters; his ſucceſſe was foreſhewed by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which he ſought to preuent, by pacifying his Heathenish gods with multitudes of Sacrifices. And with an Army extended ten miles in length, entred Perſia, cutting aſunder the Bridges by which hee paſſed ouer his men, to adde to them more of reſolution as their meanes were leſſe of returne, refuſing al humble ſubmiſſion and compoſition offred him by their King; and at the

From whose hand this Iauelin came (saith Amianus) God onely knoweth. Some report the Caster to haue bin a fugitiue Persian: others say that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded: and Calistus one of his own Guard, that wrot this Battle in Heroical Verse, affirmeth, that by some wicked Fiend or Diuell this Iauelin run him thorow. Howsoeuer, there are that report that in pulling out this Launce and casting it into the ayre with his bloud, he should vtter this blasphemous speech, and say Thou hast ouercome me, O Galilian. At his setting forth hee vowed to his gods a Sacrifice of Christian bloud, if hee returned Conquerour, but he performed it with his owne. Whose wit and eloquence needs no further testimony the the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Function his youth so worthily performed in the Christian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we see match him in story with Titus, in moderation with Aurelius, and for successe in warre, with Traian; three of the most excellent Princes: and his fortune was to see bounded with his sole greatnesse, what the hand of right & sword of tyranny had so late dispersed. But now one Errour, his Apostacie, disroabing him of al his Morall vertues, leaues him an obiect naked to the vulgar eie, but a monster of men, and marke of infamy. I hold it therefore fitting no lesse the vse, then the iustice of a Story, to doe him (as I haue done) all his right: since in him we learne that all those admirable endowments of Nature, embellished with all the morall and internall graces that Art could adde, are not the base of holinesse, without diuine grace: nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulnesse of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of security and happinesse without heauenly protection: since from the sense of Sacred Piety hee fell to Pagan Superstition: for many are called, but few are chosen; and in the seat of Presumptuous Maiesty he felt the rod of Diuine reuenge. Fla. Iouianus Emp.

An. D. 364.

THE mindes of the whole Army being much distracted by the death of Iulian, the next day being Iune twenty seuen, they met, and consulted vpon a new Emperour: where for a while two factions were maintained, & with equal deserts argued, till lastly in one accord they both agree vpon * Salustus a man very honorable and wise, but withall aged & weak, and therfore he absolutely refused the election. Iouianus by them then was nominated, in regard of his Fathers deserts indifferently commended, sayth Amianus: but Rufinus, Theodoret, and Socrates, attribute great worths vnto him, and confidently affirme his vnwillingnesse was to accept of that dignity, for that the whole Army had yeelded to Iulianus Idolatrous Edicts, openly professing himselfe to be a Christian, & withall protesting that he would not be a Soueraigne ouer an Ethnike Empire, vntill by the instance of the Souldiers, which declared themselues likewise to be Christians, he did accept the same.

Rufinus Eccles. Hist lib. 10.

Iouianus his parentage.

(2) His Father was Varonianus, by birth an Hungarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had layd downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe serued Iulian the Apostata in his Campe; from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict, cõmanding all Christians out of his pay, among whom * Iouianus (as wee haue sayd) chose rather to cast from him his Sword & Girdle, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heauenly Chieftaine, and the badge of his Christian Profession.

* Iouianus his piety.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouianus (a Roman Ensigne-bearer, lately at variance with this new elected Emperour, then a priuate man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemy stepped now aboue the degree of the common sort, reuolted to the Persians; & hauing good accesse, informed King Sapor of the death of Iulian, (to them till then vnknowne) & disabling Iouianus for an Vnskilfull and Effeminate Captain, both incouraged the Enemy, and gaue directions how to take the aduantage. The Persian as ready to execute, as joyous to heare set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Roman Souldiers. A sore battell was fought, and fountaines of bloud drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Persians, Iulianus, Macrobius, & Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of those Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of victuall (whose scarsity then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were giuen) Iouianus made Peace with the Persians for thirty yeeres, giuing them fiue Prouinces beyond Tigris some Cities and Forts in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had beene the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, euer since the Warres of Mithridates: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius and Amianus (who both liued in his dayes) and of most the deede is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Roman Empire: howbeit diuers others excuse him very iustly, considering the extreame misery and famine wherin Iulianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be giuen ouer for a prey to the Enemy, to the indangering of the whole Empire, had it not been thus pre-

(4) Howſoeuer he is highly commended by Socrates, (the continuer of Euſebius his Hiſtory) who flouriſhed aboue Twelue hundred yeeres ſince; for his conſtant faith grounded vpon the Nicene Creed, and for his Louing Reuerence to the Chriſtian Biſhops, recalling from baniſhment thoſe that Conſtantius and Iulian had exiled; among whom, Athanaſius of Alexandria was one: putting downe the Idolatrous Temples of the Gentiles, and reſtoring to their Offices both in Court and Campe, thoſe who for their Conſcience had been expulſed.

(5) At his firſt departure from Perſia, he viſited the City Tarſus, where hee cauſed the Sepulcher of Iulian (though otherwiſe he had found him auerſe both in Affection and Religion, yet for that hee was his preceding Emperour) to be richly adorned: and taking Antioch in his way, for many dayes together was troubled with ſome accidents, which that age did take for Ominous ſignes. For the Statue of Maximianus Cæſar, ſtanding at the entrance into the Kings Palace, let fall the Ball or Globe out of his hand, no force mouing it: horrible ſounds and noyſes were heard within the Conſiſtory: and Blazing-ſtarres appeared at Nooneday, Thence therefore in great haſte hee marched, and at Ancyra, declared his ſonne Varronianus his Cæſar, a very Infant, whoſe wrawlings and vnwillingneſſe to ride in the Imperiall Chariot portended (ſayth Amianus) that which after happened. For haſting ſtill towards Conſtantinople, he came to Dadaſtana, a place that diuideth Bythynia and Galatia aſunder, and there dyed ſuddenly of the obſtructions and ſtopping of the Lungs; cauſed by the dampe of a new mortered Chamber wherein he lay, or (as others write) by coales there ſet to dry the new ſeeling, whoſe vapors hauing no iſſue, ſtifled him to death, the ſeuenteenth day of February, the yeere of the worlds redemption, three hundred ſixty foure; after hee had raigned ſeuen moneths, and twenty two dayes, aged thirty three yeeres.

(6) For his perſonage, he was of goodly preſence, both tall and big, his geſture graue, his eyes gray, and countenance pleaſant: an affectionate louer and profeſſor he was of the Chriſtian religion, of indifferent learning himſelfe, but a moſt honorable imbracer thereof in others; very preciſe and conſiderate in choſing of Iudges and Magiſtrates; facile and familiar to his ſeruitors about him. CHAPTER L

An. D. 364.

AP Resently vpon the death of Iouianus, by a secret whispering and running rumor, Equitius, Tribune of the Scutarij, was nominated Emperour, a man naturally rigorous and rude; and therefore disliked of the better aduised, and no further followed. But from him, their voyces turned to Ianuarius, a kinsman to the last deceased Ionianus, at that present Gouernor of Illyrium. But he also reiected, Valentinianus then absent, was elected at Nice, as a fit and meet person for the managing of their Warres, and good of the weale publike.

Amian. Marcel. lib. 26. cap. 5.

Socrat. Eccles. hist. l. 4. c. 2.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the City Cibalas, of meane and poore parentage, the son of Gracian spoken of before, who by trade was a Rope-seller, but of great strength: and therefore by seruice preferred to places of account, & had bin made Ruler of Britain. His owne life likewise was spent in seruice of Warre, and was ere-while a Captaine ouer the Targatiers: but Iulian requiring him either to Sacrifice to his Gods, or to leaue his place; hee chose rather to lay aside his Belt then his Faith and Christianity, as likewise Iouianus had done; and so for neglecting a little honour then, he had now a farre greater bestowed on him by the disposer of all Earthly Kingdomes. The Estate so vr-ging it, he made Valens (his brother) Partner in the Empire, the trumpets euery where sounding Warres throughout the Roman world. For the Almans inuaded Gaul and Rhætia, the Sarmatians and Quadi made spoile of Pannonia: the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacots infested the Britaines: the Austorians made roades into Africa: the Gothes ransacked Thracia, and the Persians entred Armenia. For which cause Valens remained to defend the East, & Valentinianus took his progresse into the West, where in three Battles vnder the conduct of Iouinus, hee discomfited the Almans: and Valens likewise ouercame and beheaded Procopius; whose feature we haue here expressed, a dangerous Vsurper in the East.

(3) But in Britaine things prospered not so well: for by the generall bandings of the foresaid Nations their old enemies, the Prouince was sore distressed and brought to extreame misery. For Nectaridius ridius, Admirall of the British Fleet they slew, and Balcobandes Lord warden of the Marches, by a traine of these barbarous people, was forelaid & assayled on euery side. The intelligence of which occurrences, when it was brought to Rome with great horrour, the Emperor first sent hither Seuerus, Steward of his House; if fortune would happily speed his hand, to redresse whatsoeuer had happened amisse. But he in short time being called away, had not the hap to see the wished successe. Then Ioninus, famous for his Warres in Germany, came into the same parts; and seeing the puissance of the enemy, meant to craue ayd of the Auxiliary Forces, the vrgent necessity requiring so much: at last, in regard of many (and those fearefull) accidents, which rumor continually reported, touching the state of this Iland, hither was designed Theodosius, a man esteemed most happy, and approued for his Martial prowesse, who with a bold resolution & select power both of Horse and Foote, set forward for Britaine.

(4) The Picts were at that time diuided into two Nations, to wit, * Deucalidones & * Vesturiones. The Attacots likewise a warlike kind of people, and the Scots ranging in diuerse parts, wasted all where they went. As for the Tracts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons their neer confined neighbours, whersoeuer they could breake foorth, and make Roades by Sea or Land, made hauocke here by seizing of Booties, firing of Townes, in killing of men and women; and leading away Captines. To stay these wofull miseries, if the Heauens had beene so benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this * our end of the World: and comming to * Bononia, which lyeth diuided from the opposite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terrible Tides, where the waters are seene sometimes to match the higheste Mountaine, & againe to settle with the leuell of the Plaines, without any harme of Saylers or Passage: this Sleue with a gentle course he crossed, and arriued at * Rutopy, a quiet Roade and Harbour ouer against it: from whence after that the Bactauians, the Herculi, Iouij, and Victores (Companies bold and confident in their strengths) were come, hee marched towards Lundinium, an ancient city, which posterities afterwards named Augusta: and hauing seuered his Troopes into sundry parts, he charged vpon those companies of rouing & robbing enemies, euen when they were heauy laden with Bootyes and spoyles, & were driuing away before them both Men and Women bound for their Captines, besides much Cattle, and a great Prey. These hee soone discomfited, and restored to the poore distressed Tributaries their liberties & losses, bestowing some small parcels thereof among his weary and well deseruing Souldiers: and entred the City with exceeding great joy, in manner of a Petty-tryumph, which erewhile was ouer-whelmed with Calamities, but now on the sudden refreshed and set in perfect safety.

Theodosius ioifully receiued into London.

(5) Vpon this prosperous successe encouraged to greater attempts, he abode yet doubtfull of the future, casting with himselfe many proiects, which poysed Fortunes Scales alike: but lastly by certain Captiues & Fugitines he learned that those Companies of sundry fierce Nations, spread so farre & diffusedly vpon the face of the Prouince, could not be vanquished vnlesse it were by slights and stratagemes. By Edicts therefore he first proclaimed impunity to such as had forsaken their Colours, if they would return; wherby many which had run to the Enemy, or at their owne pleasures had beene dispersed into diuers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their resolutions in his behalfe: Notwithstanding, mistrusting the euent, and pensiue still with cares, he thought good to call to his assistance Ciuilis, a man of great vnderstanding, quick spirit, and withall an vpright Iusticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputy, & likewise Dulcitius a Captaine, renowned for his skill and deeds of Armes.

Amian. Marcel. lib. 28. cap. 3.

(6) After Consultation with them, hauing gotten courage, and departing from Augusta with a power of Soldiers, which in his politicke industry he had leuied & trayned to his hand, hee brought exceeding great succour euery where vnto the troubled & confused state of the Britains; gaining before hand such places in each part, as might giue aduantage to annoy the barbarous Enemy; and enioyned the Common Souldiers no seruice, wherof himselfe tooke not the Assay with a cheerfull heart: in this sort performing as well the Offices of an Actiue and hardy souldier, as the carefull charge of a right-noble Generall, he discomfited & put to flight diuers Nations, whom insolent pride (fed with security, had incited and set on fire, to inuade the Romans Territories; and so restored wholly vnto their former state the Cities & Castles which had sustained many losses, and established a sure peace for a long time following. (7) Now

(7) Now there happened whiles he atchieued these exploits, a dangerous matter likely to haue broken out into great mischiefe, had it not beene quenched in the beginning of the enterprise: for one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud spirit, first Deputy Lieutenant, and after President, for some notable offence banished into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had beene; as one impatient of rest, like some noisome wilde Beast, vpon a certain swelling pride, rose vp in commotion against Theodosius, whom he perceiued to be the onely man able to withstand his wicked designes. Howbeit; casting about many wayes, both closely & apparently, as the gale of his vnmeasurable desire rose higher, he solicited as well the banished persons as Souldiers, promising (as the time would afoord) rewards to allure & draw them on to some actuall attempt. Yet when the day came wherin it should haue beene effected, Theodosius hauing intelligence thereof, surprised Valentinus with some few of his inward complices, & deliuered them vnto Dulcitius, to be put to death accordingly. But in his military skill and policy, (wherein he was reputed to haue exceeded all men liuing in those dayes,) gessing at future dangers, he inhibited all Inquisitions to be made touching the rest of the Conspirators, lest so generall a feare surprising at once, & spread abroad among many, those tempestuous troubles of the Province, which were now well allayed, should reuiue againe.

Valentinus a Rebell put to death.

Theodosius all expert Warriour.

(8) Therefore turning himselfe from this businesse to the reforming of such enormities as were of most consequence, now that all dangers were quite ouerblowne, he reedified the Cities, repaired the Garison Castles, and fortified the Frontiers with standing Watches, and strong Fore-fences. And thus hauing recouered the Province againe which had yeelded subiection to the Enemies, hee reduced it vnto the pristine Estate, so as by his meanes and motion it had againe a lawfull Gouernour appointed, and also named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperour.

Britaine called Valentia.

(9) The Arcani, a kind of men (as witnesseth Amianus) instituted by those of ancient times for politicke imployments, who by little and little were fallen into disorders and vices, he remooued from their Stations, as being manifestly conuicted, for that (induced with the greatnes of rewards receiued or promised) they had diuers times discouered vnto the Barbarous whatsoeuer was done or debated betwixt the President and his Councell: for indeede their charge was to runne to and fro by long iournies, to intimate and make knowne vnto the Romans Captaines vpon the Marches: what doings and stirres were among the Neighbour-Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reueale the secrets of the State.

Amian. Marcel. lib. 28. cap. 7.

Arcani remoued from their Stations.

(10) And thus Theodosius hauing managed most excellently these affaires, was sent for to the Emperours Court; who leauing the Prouince ouer-ioyed for their Peace, was no lesse famous for his many important Victories, then was either Furius, Camillus, or Papinius Cursor. And being honourably accompanied and attended vnto the Narrow Seas, with the heartie loue and fauour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde passed ouer, & came to the Princes Campe, where (being receiued with ioy and prayse) he succeeded in the roome of Valens Iouinus, who had the coduct of the Horsemen. For these his Martiall deeds so happily atchieued, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, resembling a Man of Armes on Horsebacke, as by Symmachus may be vnderstood, thus speaking to his sonne Theodosius: The Author of your kindred & stocke, Captaine Generall both in Africke and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) consecrated by the most honourable Order with Statues of Knight-hood. And in his commendations, Claudius with full note thus poetically sang:

Theodosius comparable to Camillus.

When Thule did reake with Picts-blood spilt in warres,
And Ireland did huge heapes of Scots deplore?

Dreadfull sights, and fearefull Earth-quakes. Amian. Marce. lib. 26. cap. 14.

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the signes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earth-quakes, Inundations, and the like; whereof Marcellinus thus reporteth: A little after the Sun-rising (saith he) the waightie and steady masse of the whole Earthly Globe shooke, flashes of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea also driuen aside, and the waues and billowes so preposterously tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfes being discouered and laid emptie, a man might haue seene sundry sorts of swimming creatures sticking in the mudde: Also the vast Vallies and Rockes, which Nature had set farre away vnder the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; insomuch that many Ships were bedded fast in the drie ground, and flocks of people straggled at their pleasure in the small remaines of water, to take vp Fishes as the Sea-spoile; when on the sudden the waues disdaining to be thus dispossessed, returned with such violent beating vpon the Ilands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they ouer-flowed, and laid leuell an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furious discord of the Elements, the surface of the World being couered, represented strange and wonderfull sights. Among which S. Ierome reporteth, that there rained Woolll from Heauen so perfect and good, that no better grew vpon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

Gulfes of the Sea laid bare, and many Cities drowned.

Paulus Orosius. S. Ierome. Woolll rained from Heauen.

(12) Fraomarius, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobantes in Germanie, was made Tribune and Colonel ouer a Regiment of Almains in Britaine, which for number and valour in those dayes were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was ministred for him to worke vpon. But the death of the Emperour presently following, admits no mention of further discourse which happened in this manner: The Quadi after many molestations done to the Romane Legions and their Confederates, sent their Ambassadours vnto him, desiring pardon for their former faults committed, and an abolishment of all remembrances thereof: with whom being in earnest conference, suddenly the bloud gushed out of his mouth; and being laid vpon his bed, shortly after died of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the Blew Markes appearing vpon his dead body gaue coniecture: Nouember the seuenth; of his age fiftie fiue yeeres, hauing raigned eleuen yeeres, eight moneths, and two dayes, in the yeare of our Christ three hundred seuentie fiue.

(13) For presence, he was Maiesticall, of body fat, his complexion faire, his eyes gray, and hauing therewith somewhat a scue cast, his haire shining bright, his ioynts strong and well knit: he was a Prince mercifull and louing, & mitigated many Tributes formerly imposed on the Prouinces: a wise Warriour, sterne in countenance, hastie of speech, and chaste of body, a good Iusticer, & impatient of all delayes. But these his Vertues with some Vices were accompanied: for he is taxed with enuie and partialitie, in punishing seuerely the poore Souldier for small offences, but remissiue to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cause (by Amianus his report) of the troubles in Britaine, the losses in Africke, and the wasts in Illyricum.

Valentinianus his personage and vertues.

(14) His Arian brother Valens suruiuing him, raigned Emperour in the East; by whose sufferance the Barbarous Gothes entred Thracia, which presently proued to be the bane of the Roman World; for that these Gothes (a strange and vnknowne People till then) being forced out of a secret Nooke in Scythia, by the Hog-backt Hunnes, rushing as an vnresistable Whirlewinde frō those High Mountaines, infested the Coasts about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to passe the Riuer Donaw into Thracia, where long in quiet they stayed not, but like a violent Floud running with a full current, they ouerwhelmed all before them, ouercomming the Romans in many Battles, and in one slew the Emperour Valens, with most of his approoued Captaines, and twenty-fiue Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Army hardly escaping vnslaine. Some report that Valens flying the Field, tooke into a house neere Adrianople, whither being pursued by the Enemie, and his Hold fired vpon his head, was therein burned to ashes, after hee had sate Emperour foureteene yeeres.

GRacianus, the Eldeſt Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Empreſſe Seuera, was made his Fathers Collegue in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Raigne: notwithſtanding ſix dayes after his death, his ſecond Sonne Valentinian, a Childe of Foure yeeres old, by the aduice of the Councell and generall conſent of the Campe, was alſo ſtiled and proclaimed Emperour. Theſe Brethren liued in much loue, and ruled in the Weſt, as their vncle Valens did in the Eaſt, of whom we laſt ſpake. And albeit Gracian had cauſe of diſpleaſure, that this his younger Brother was thus aduanced without his allowance; yet he as a Prince kinde and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him vp in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered vnto himſelfe and his own Mother for Valentinians mothers ſake.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Iuſtina, a damſel of an admirable feature and exceeding beautie, ſurpaſſing all other women ſo farre, that the Empreſſe her ſelfe fell in loue with her, and vſually conuerſed with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her moſt priuate ſecrets vnto her as her truſtie Counſeller, and often bathing together in the ſame Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the meaſure of Womaniſh modeſtie, but that ſhee refrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Husband) to extoll her incomparable beautie, preferring her far aboue any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinian ſo farre affected this Lady, as that he tooke her to his Wife; by whom he had this young Valentinian, and alſo three Daughters, notwithſtanding Seuera was yet liuing.

(3) The ſtormes of the Gothes as a violent tempeſt beating ſtill againſt the Shores of the Romane Prouinces, cauſed Gracian to beare Sayle toward the faſeſt Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his ſhippe to the moſt aſſured Pilot: their Forces being ſo great, and their outrages ſo terrible, that hee thought it beſt not to aduenture his own perſon, but to imploy ſome other approoued Captaine. For which exploit, none was held more ſufficient then Theodosius, the sonne of that Theodosius who was so famous for his British warres, and whose life was taken away by Valens the Easterne Emperour. Him hee made first Captaine Generall of ỹ Roman Empire, and immediately vpon his first seruice against the Gothes, his Fellow Emperour and Augustus, allotting him those parts in the East, that his vncle Valens lately had enioyed.

Theodosius, Captaine generall of the Roman Empire, and fellow Emperour.

(4) In many Battles, fought to the last drop of bloud, this worthy Generall ouercame the Gothes, so that their King Athanarius was lastly inforced to sue for his Peace, which vpon honourable compositions was granted, and himselfe in most princely manner entertained by Theodosius in the Imperiall Citie Constantinople; where falling sicke after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and sumptuously buried by the Emperour. These reports caused Sapor, the most puissant King of Persia, to submit himselfe vnto Theodosius, and by his Ambassadours, attending his Court, obtained his Amity. Thus gloriously raigning & perfect peace established, he ordained his young sonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperour in the East.

Theodosius ouercommeth the Gothes.

Aurelius Victor. Paulus Oros.

Sapor King of Persia.

(5) But the affaires in the Westerne Empire proceeded nothing so fortunately: for Gracian a meeke and soft spirited man, ballanced with Theodosius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Probus, held both Rome and Italy at his deuotion; onely Gallia obeyed Gracian. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spaine, but descended lineally from Constantine the Great, by his affabilitie and liberall carriage, had wonne the affections of the Britaines to side with him; a man no doubt, both Valiant and Wise, had he held his alleageance to his Soueraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purposes, when the Scots and Picts with their wonted Inroads sore indamaged the Prouince, he set himselfe for their deliuerance, and therein sped so well, that the Souldiers by constraint (as Orosius saith) forced him to assume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. And so hasting into Gallia, with all the flower and strength well neere of the Britaines forces, arriued in the mouth of Rhene, vnto whom also the Germans Army ioyned, and now accounting himselfe an absolute Monarch, admitted Victor his sonne, then Cæsar, to be partner of his Empire, whose Stamp therefore with his Fathers we haue here annexed.

(6) Thus Maximus establishing his throne at Triers, Spread his wings (saith Gyldas) the one into Spaine, the other into Italy, and with the terror of his Name, lenied Tributes and Pensions for Souldiers pay, of the most fell and sauage Germans.

Against him Gracianus made his power, but after fiue dayes skirmishings was forsaken of his owne Souldiers, and so put to flight. And now deiected and destitute of meanes to maintaine his quarrell, he sent Ambrose (a great Doctour of the Church) his Ambassadour vnto Maximus, to intreate for Peace, which in outward shew was granted, but was farre otherwise intended, as the sequell prooued. For seeking his death, he did shortly after effect it in this wise: He caused Letters, and reports to be giuen vnto Gracian, that his Empresse was in iourney to visit him, and withall sent forth a Carroche stuffed with Souldiers, and with them a desperate Captaine named Andragathius. Gracian greatly reioycing for his Wiues approch, prepared himselfe to meet Her accordingly, and opening the Litter, thinking to embrace his Empresse, was by these Ruffins treacherously murthered neere vnto Lyons, when he had raigned fifteene yeeres, and liued twentie nine. Valentinian with his Mother Iustina, fearing the like conspiracies, became supplicants vnto Theodosius in the East against Maximus.

(7) He therefore preparing his Forces, marched as farre as Aquileia in Lombardie, where Maximus remained both con-

For hauing fortified the ſtraits of the Mountaines with ſufficient Garriſons, and dammed the Hauens with ſtrength of Ships, himſelfe and aſſiſters with great boldneſſe proceeded againſt Theodoſius, and gaue him a Battle before the Citie Syſcia in Pannonia, and againe moſt valiantly receiued him in another, vnder the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them was ouercome. From this laſt, he ſecretly retired vnto Aquileia, where of his owne Souldiers he was betrayed, and deliuered to Theodoſius his purſuer; and by him to the Executioner to be beheaded: of which his vnfortunate, but deſerued end, the famous Biſhop Martinus Turonenſis being in Britaine, did foretell him long before.

This Victory was held ſo worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward ſolemnized that day euery yeere as feſtiuall, ſaith Procopius.

(8) But theſe Britaines that had aſſiſted Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly inuade Armorica, and there planted themſelues: From whence (ſaith Beda) the Britaines firſt arriued into this Iland. But ſurely himſelfe is either greatly miſtaken, or elſe we miſtake him altogether, and that rather, for that by Cæſar thoſe Coaſts that lie vpon the Sea-ſhoares, are called Armorica, and there the Celtes ſeated, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden; and ſo from thence they might ſpread themſelues further into theſe Britiſh Ilands, long before it receiued the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Prouinces at the ſame time, by the inteſtine Warres of the Empire: for the Gaules were moleſted by the Frankes; Spaine by the Sueuians; and Africk by the Vandals: the Eaſt parts by the Heruli, Oſtroges, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards, and ſhortly after by the Gothes.

Beda hiſt. Anglia lib. 1. cap. 1.

(9) Theſe troubles in the Prouinces, cauſed the Emperours to call home their Armies, with Aydes of their Allies, and all too little to ſupport their owne declining Eſtates, which now began to end of it ſelfe, and theſe Emperours raignes to be cut off by their vntimely deaths.

But to returne into the path of our Hiſtory, from whence (by the intangled occaſions of theſe foure Emperours raigning together) we haue wandred; let vs remember what occurrents happened vpon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and haſten to end the greatneſſe of the Empire, which in moſt Prouinces began to end of it ſelfe. For Valentinian being rid of his feares, vnto which he had beene ſubiect; and Theodoſius of his Collegue, vnto whom he was enforced; great hope was conceiued of a flouriſhing Eſtate, but it brought forth onely the remaines of their downefall: for the one returning to Conſtantinople in great Triumph, liued not long after; and the other left peaceably in the Weſterne World, was (as you ſhall heare) ſoone made away by Conſpiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hoſtile Enemies, retained in his Court thoſe that ſought his life, whereof Arbogaſtes, a Captaine of a haughtie ſtomacke, politicke, aduenturous, and of great power, but withall of a baſe parentage, a ſtranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. Theſe corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by ſtrangling him in his bed, giuing it forth that the Emperour had hanged himſelfe; which was ſo confidently auouched, that Proſperus in his Addition to Euſebius writing his death, ſaith, that it was acted by himſelfe, after he had liued twentie ſix, and raigned ſixteene yeeres, being ſtrangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred ninetie foure.

FLAVIVS THEODOSIVS.

CHAPTER LII.

Flau. Theodosius Emp.

An. Do. 379

WE haue declared in the life of the last preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres & Victories of this most worthy Theodosius, vntill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for so most writers terme him:) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in Warre and Peace to be further related.

(2) This Emperour returning from Aquileia in Lombardie vnto Constantinople in the East, long time there stayed not, but was drawne againe into the West both to reuenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow Emperor so trecherously strangled, and also to oppose the proceedings of Eugenius, whose Coine wee haue heere expressed, being one of the Murtherers then vsurping that portion of the Empire, and sided by Arbogastes the other.

Theodosius goeth against Arbogastes and Eugenius.

(3) Theodosius marching with his forces towards the Confines of Italie, found the passages stopped at the foote of the Alps, and his Enemies powers farre surmounting his: Therefore a while to deliberate on these businesses, hee pitched his Tents, and there stayed. In the meane time Eugenius and Arbogastes his opposites had forelaid the Country, and hemmed him about in such a strait, that no victuals could be brought vnto his Campe.

(4) No meanes being now left, but either to cleere the passages, or be ouerthrowne, he first became supplicant with Fastings and Teares vnto his God, whom he knew to be the God of Hosts, and whom euer he had serued, and whose ayde had hitherto neuer failed him: whereupon boldly incouraging his men, he accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiously begunne, fell so sore against him, that ten thousand of his Souldiers were presently slaine; and the rest despairing, ready to flie, himselfe at that instant had beene surprized, had not God turned the heart of Arbitio, a Captaine of his Enemies, suddenly to come to his side, and to rescue him. Theodosius much daunted by these vnfortunate beginnings, yet conceiued better hopes of the following successe, trusting to the vprightnesse of his Cause, and the helpe of his God, which still he implored, till the Heauens were propitious to his earnest desires.

Theodosius prayeth to God for victorie.

Sabell. Enn. 9. lib. 9.

(5) For suddenly a violent tempest arose, and a raging winde rushed so extreamely on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wise able to withstand it, the power thereof beating backe againe their darts into their owne sides; whereas the arrowes shot from the Emperors part, were thereby forced with double strength to pierce through the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a most glorious victory was obtained; and Eugenius taken, who lay grouelling at the Emperours feete, deploring his estate, and craving his pardon; but euen as he kneeled with cries and teares, the Souldiers standing by strucke off his Head. And Arbogastes the Author of these euils by flight escaping, escaping, two dayes after tanne himselfe vpon his Sword, and so reuenged on himselfe his own wicked actions. This victory was atchieued the sixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninetie six, by Socrates account: and was so famous, that besides the Records of Christian Historians, Claudius a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the same in his Heroick Poeme.

Arbogastes killeth himselfe.

Gods darling deare, the heauens thy soldiers were in armes,
And windes conspired to ayd and follow thy allarmes.

Theodosius dieth.

(6) Theodosius thus deliuered, repaired vnto Millan, where, worne with yeares and trauels, shortly after he sickened vnto death. And sending for his son Honorius, made him Emperour of the West, and to Arcadius gaue the East, wherein he had before made him his Cæsar. The Prouince of Africa he assigned to the gouernment of one Gyldus in his Sonnes behalfe, and in the Non-age of Arcadius appointed Rufinus for Constantinople, and Stilicho Tutor to yong Honorius in Italie, three most worthy men vndoubtedly, had the greatnesse of their spirits bin contained within the lists of their trust and places.

Honorius and Arcadius made Emperours.

Gildus Gouernour of Africa.
Rufinus Gouernour of Constantinople.
Stilicho Gouernour of Italie.

(7) This last named Flauius Stilicho, famous for a long time, and an inward companion with Theodosius, had been imployed in the Britaines warres against the Inroades of the Scots, Vandales, and Picts; and therein had borne himselfe with fortunate successe, as the Poet Claudian implieth where he bringeth in Britaine thus speaking:

Stilicho sometimes imployed in the British Warres.

Me quoq; vicinis pereuntem Gætibus, inquit,
Muniuit Stilicho, totã quum Scotus Hibernẽ
Mouit, & infesto spumauit remige Thetis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
Scotica, nec Pictum tremerem; ne littore toto prospicerem dubijs venientem Saxona vẽtis.

Stilicho commended by Claudian for his seruice in Britaine.

And I, saith she, that readie was by bordering foes to perish,
When Scots did cause the Irish starres, then Stilicho did me cherish.
When Seas did foame with strokes of Oares,
that beat the billowes backe,
His force effecting with his cares,
preuented still my wracke:
He bade me feare no forraine powers;
that Scots or Picts could make,
Nor of the Saxons that on Seas, vncertaine courses take.

So that being by him freed from those many dangers, and all her enemies ouerthrowne, shee singeth her securitie by the same Poet thus:

——Domito quòd Saxone Thetis
Mitior aut fracto secura Britannia Picto:
My Seas, though rough, are calm'd, sith Saxons conquer'd are,
And I securely rest,
now Picts are queld in warre.

But this her ioy, through the Treasons of these three Gouernours, was soone turned into laments and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fatall period, as presently it will appeare.

Theodosius his vertues.

(8) This Theodosius for his Princely parts, by all Writers is ranked among the very best of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Traian for his feature and personage, so may hee be compared in wisedome to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Christian profession and deuotion, with Constantine the Great: and for his meeknes equall to any: Whereof among many other, we haue one example very remarkeable; Vpon an offence committed by the Inhabitants of Thessalonica, he commanded most seuere punishment to be inflicted, which was so vnaduisedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were inuolued therein. He then cõming to Millan, would haue entred the Church to haue cõmunicated with other Christians in their sacred deuotiõs; which Ambrose, the great Doctor, and Bishop of that Sea (though otherwise a man of admirable mildnesse) resisted and forbad, in which estate the Emperour stood for eight moneths continuance: & then with great humility & submissiõ, acknowledging his offence, was absolued, & againe receiued into the congregation. For preuenting of the like rash offences by him committed, he then enacted a Law, that thirtie dayes should passe betwixt the sentẽce of death, & the execution of the Malefactor: And to suppresse his hasty choller (whereunto he was much subiect) his vsuall manner was to recite the Greeke Alphabet before he vttered any speech sauoring of that humor.

Theodosius vpõ his submission absolued by the Church.

Theodosius his Art to suppresse anger.

(9) He died Ianuary the seuenteenth, the yeere of the worlds happines 395. when he had raigned seuenteene yeeres, and liued sixtie; as Aurelius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his History. His first wife was Placilla, a religious Lady, the mother of Arcadius and Honorius; by his second wife he had a daughter named Placidia Galla, first married vnto Athaulpus King of the Gothes, and after his death vnto Constantine, whom Honorius her brother made Augustus and his fellow-Emperour.

ARCADIVS HONORIVS Emperours.

CHAPTER LIII.

Anno 395.

AT all was the Act of Theodosius, in his Election of the three foresaid Protectors, whose greatnes carried with a glutted prosperitie, grew to a surfet after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downefall of the now-aged and drouping Empire: first Gildus in Africa, not contented with the title of Comes or Earle, cast off all subiection, and as an absolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his Soueraigne.

Gildus rebelleth.

Paulus Diaconus.

(2) Against these proceedings, his own brother Mastelzerius opposed himselfe, and both in words and acts assayed to set him in his wonted place of obedience, which by no other meanes could bee brought to passe, but by assistance sent him from Honorius: with which, though much too weake, he marched against the Emperours Enemy, and as Paulus Orosius writeth, more by force of prayers to God, then power of men, in his encounter preuailed, and beheaded Gildus for his Treason. But himselfe becomming mightie, and forgetting that which in others hee remembred, himselfe vsurped the command of Africa against Honorius, casting off all subiectiue obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Prouince: The Souldiers that had lately assisted the Emperours cause, now well perceiuing his ayme leuelled at the Crowne, thought best to cut the string before he looséd the shaft, and made him shorter by the head.

Mastelzerius ouercõmeth his brother Gildus.

(3) Ruffinus in Constantinople as boldly bare himselfe, thinking Arcadius both too weake & yong to sound the depth of his designes, whose thoughts did also worke vpon conceited Soueraignte: he therefore secretly sollicited; the Gothes to war vpon the Empire, that so Arcadius might either be slaine or intrapped, or else himselfe in those dangers, set vp as the more sufficient. But these things thus dangerously complotted by Ruffinus, were as politically preuented by the Emperour, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treason could bring forth either Bud or Blade, it was discouered, and the Author slaine by an Italian Band, his head (which as some affirme, first tooke breath in Britaine) was aduanced ouer a Gate in Constantinople.

Ruffinus ambition.

Ruffinus slaine

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the deaths of these two Traytors, the Third stood vp with more danger in the West: for Stilicho, Tutor to yong Honorius, thought it not sufficient honour for him to haue his Daughter an Empresse by the Marriage of his Ward; but set at hazard (for himselfe and son) his owne Conscience, both their Liues, and the fatall ruine of the Now-declining Empire. For first, sowing seditions amongst the Lieutenants of the Prouinces, picked also quarrels in ỹ Emperors Court, Cashiering with disgraces those Gothes that had serued with good proofe of their fidelitie aboue twentie yeeres, since their entertainment by Theodosius. These to reuenge their wrongs, chose for their Chieftaine a valiant Gothe named Alaricus, which shortly proued the Scourge of Rome: with whom ioyned the Vandals, Alanes, and Suevians, who ioyntly with great fury began to warre in Austria and Hungarie, increasing their Powers with such ſuch multitudes, that as Paulus Oroſius, an Author of that time ſaith; The World was amazed & ſtood in feare. For vnto theſe Colonies reſorted two hundred thouſand Gothes more, vnder the leading of Radagaſius their King, who together with vnited Forces, ſubdued Thracia, Hungary, Auſtrich, Sclauonia, & Dalmatia, and ſpoiled all in ſuch manner, that it ſeemed Diuels and not Men had paſſed that way, as Saint Ierome (who liued at that time) expreſſeth: Theſe brute Beaſts (ſaith he) ſuffered by the wrath of God in this warre, haue laid Cities waſte, ſlaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and deſolate, whereof the Prouinces of Thracia, and Sclauonia, with the Country wherin my ſelfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

(3) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and theſe fierce Nations making hauock where they came, the Armies in Britaine were put in great feare, leaſt the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flaſh out, and take hold of them alſo. Therefore prouidently to preuent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperor, yeelding him their obedience ſome ſhort time, and then finding his defects, immediately murthered him.

The features and Imperiall Title ſtamped on the Romiſh Money of theſe two Vſurpers, (according to the vſuall manner of the like in Eſtate) wee finde not, neither ſtands it with credit of our Hiſtory to faine them at pleaſure: therefore til time bring them forth from the Caues of obſcuritie, we haue allowed them place onely by theſe circles inſerted, that others may ſupply what preſently wee want, and accompliſh by Pencile, what wee cannot by Preſſe.

(6) Yet time to Conſtantine hath beene more fauourable in preſeruing his remẽbrance by his minted Monys, which here with his Story we preſent to ſight. At the fall of theſe former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but vpon confidence onely conceiued of his Name, was made Emperour, who with more reſpect of honour, and liking of his aduancers, bare himſelfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologne, he eaſily induced the Romans forces as farre as the Alps to ſide with him: Valentia in France he manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had beene neglected, he fortified with Garriſons: vpon the Alps as well as vpon the Maritime Coaſts, where paſſages were frequented, he built Fortreſſes: Spaine likewiſe hee held vnder the hand of Conſtans his Son, whom of a Monke he had made Auguſtus, and by whoſe valour ſubdued all from the Pyrenean Mountaines to the Ocean. Whoſe Moneys wanting to expreſſe his Image and Stile, we haue alſo ſupplied with another Blanke.

Honorius alloweth Constantine Emperour.

(7) Constantine prospering as we haue said, sent Letters of excuse vnto Honorius, affirming constantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to doe what he did: whereby he so pleased the Emperor, that commending his Valour, and holding him fit, he sent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Whereupon this new-grown blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seate, commanding the Citie to bee called Constantia from him, and ordained that the Assemblies of the affaires of Seuen Prouinces should be therein held. But this his Sun-shine of prosperitie was soone ouer-cast with the Clouds of aduerse fortunes, & his Crowne and life laid together in the dust. For in Spaine against him was arreared Maximus a Vassall, whose Generall Geroncius intercepting Constans, (his Sonne and Cæsar) at Vienna in France; slew him: and Constantine himselfe within the walles of Arles, besieged for Foure Moneths, after the Raigne of Foure Yeeres, laid aside his Purple Robe, and entred the Church in Order of Priesthood, and surrendring the Citie with his Stile Imperiall, was lastly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

Constans slaine.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Prouince a while was refreshed by the Wisedome and Prowesse of Victorinus her Lieutenant, who often represt the Incursions of the Scots and Picts: whereupon in his prayse Rutilius Claudius thus wrote:

And all the Champian Fields, which Britaines fierce doe till.

(9) But Rome at this time being sore afflicted, and by Alaricus with his Gothes and Vandals presently sacked, Honorius sent for Victorinus with his Army out of Britaine, to the rescue of the Citie, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth vp among other Aydes, the British Legion sent thither: whereof the Scots and Picts had soone notice, and (according to their wonted manner) with fire and sword molested their neighbours.

Victorinus leaueth Britaine.

(10) The Britains therefore resolutely engaging themselues into dangers, tooke Armes, and freed their Cities and States from those Barbarous People: by whose example, the rest of their Nation in Armorica, with the Prouinces of Gaulois, deliuered themselues also from their oppressions, and all of them cast out the Romane Presidents; setting a forme of Common-wealth to their owne liking. But these our Britains growing too weake to withstand the continuall Inroades of their Northerne Enemies, humbly besought Honorius for succour; whose returne of cõfort consisted only in words, exhorting them by Letters, to stand vpon their owne Guard. But they knowing it was not words, which must helpe them, againe deplored their miseries, & so obtained of him the assistance of one Legion, which in their ayde droue backe those Assailants into their owne Marches, and fortified againe the Wall betwixt the Frith of Edenburgh vnto Clnid: so then departing, left the Britaines to defend themselues; who now, besides the Common Enemies so often mentioned, were much molested, and their Faith corrupted by one Pelagius, by birth a Britaine, by profession a Monke, and by lewd doctrine an Heretike, who was brought vp in the famous Monastery of Bangor in Wales; who had also trauel'd Italy, Sicilia, and Egypt for the study of learning, and grew into great fauour with Paulinus Bishop of Nola, and with S. Augustin also, till his Heriticall Assertions, which had been by him and his disciple Celestius a Scot secretly taught, (and by S. Ierome, discouered) were afterwards condemned by Innocentius the first, Bishop of Rome. But the Arch Heretike returning into Britaine, & began againe obstinately to maintaine the same, together with Agricola, one who spread the venome of that Heresie into Forraine parts: whose doctrines were, 1. That Man, without the grace of God, was able to fulfill all the Commandements. 2. That man in himself had Freewill. 3. That the Grace of God was giuen vnto vs according to our merits. 4. That the Iust haue no sinne. 5. That Children are free from Originall sinne. 6. That Adam should haue dyed, though he had not sinned. And therein also one Timothy most impiously disputed against the Diuine and Humane Natures of Christ. Notwithstanding at the same time flourished Fastidius, a most learned British Bishop, and Chrysanthus also the Deputie or Vicegerent of Britaine, who with great honour gouerned the affayres of the Church and Common-wealth, and was afterwards (as elsewhere we haue shewed) made Bishop at Constantinople of the Nouatians against his will.

(11) Thus were the affaires of this Land managed vnder these Brethren Emperours: the elder of which, Arcadius died in peace at Constantinople, leauing his sonne Theodosius, a childe of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Hisdigerdus King of Persia; a matter which seemed at first very dangerous, but prooued at the last very profitable. He raigned thirteene yeares, and died the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeare of Christs birth foure hundred and ten. At which time one Ioninus, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, vsurped the Purple Robe, and stamped his Coines with the Title of Victorie, as is seene in one which wee herepresent.

THEODOSIVS 2. VALENTINIAN 3.

CHAPTER LIV.

An. D. 408.

GReat haue beene the Warres, and strange the Alterations, which both here at home, and through the World abroad, haue chanced vnto States, since the first attempts of Iulius Cæsar; vnto these present Emperours, Theodosius the second; and Valentinian the third, his Associate; whose Liues and Raignes, did conclude the Successions of the Romish Monarchs within this Iland of Great Britaine, and threw downe their Triumphall Arches, in many other Prouinces, which for long time had beene obsequious to Romes Soueraigne Command. So vncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength so liable to Mutabilitie, that the Powers and Periods thereof, held in His hand that holdeth the Vniuersall Ball, are sud-

The Romane Monarchies continuance.

(2) The continuance of whose Estates; seeme they neuer so Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath seldome extended much the limit of Fiue hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flames, fall in the ashes of their own consuming decayes, or els hath receiued some other alteration of Empires encrease, as many learned Writers haue obserued in most Comon-welaths. So was it in the State established by GOD himselfe among his Peculiar People. As for ỳ Promise to Abraham, made of Christ the Blessed Seed and Life of Man (where ceased the Worlds formerly-vsed computation from the Ages of Men) vnto the Law deliuered vpon Mount Sinai, declaring condẽnation and death, were foure hundred and thirty yeeres: from Israels departure out of Egypt, when their Commonwealth began to be ruled by Iudges; and Gods seruice celebrated in the Tabernacle vnder Curtaines, vnto the Building of their Glorious Temple erected by King Salomon, were yeeres foure hundred and eightie. From the Annointing of Dauid, the first King, set vpon Iudahs Throne, vnto the death of Zedechiah the last King thereof, slaine by Nebuchadnezer, and that Holy Temple consumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred and seuentie. And other Politike Estates haue stood much vpon the like Space of time. For the Kingdome of Athens set vp by Cecrops the first King thereof, vnto Codrus the last, when they changed their Monarchie to a Democracie, is said to haue continued foure hundred and ninetie yeeres. The Lacedemonians State from Lycurgus their Law-giuer, vnto Alexander the Great, that ouerthrew it, flourished the space of foure hundred ninetie one yeeres. From the expulsion of Romes Kings vnder Tarquinius vnto the affected Empire in Iulius Cæsar, were foure hundred ninetie and nine yeeres. And omitting many others, to come to our selues; from Cæsars first Inuasion of Britaine, vnto the dayes of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were fiue hundred yeeres.

From the Saxons intrusions, and diuision of this Realme into an Heptarchie vnder their Gouernment; vntill the vnited Monarchie made by King Egbert, in the yeere eight hundred and nineteene, were yeeres foure hundred sixtie nine. But from thence, vntill their issue failed in King Edward Confessor, were yeeres onely two hundred fortie seuen. And from the Normans Conquest, vnto the death of that most sacred Soueraigne of eternall memory, Queene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAINE; and the vnion of the whole Iland to be brought into one entire Monarchie by the rightfull Succession and thrice-happie entrance of our most gracious King IAMES, are yeeres fiue hundred thirtie sixe. (3) Theodosius the sonne of Arcadius beganne his Empire in the yeere of the worlds saluation foure hundred and eight, and was Gouerned with a speciall protection by the Persian King during his Minoritie, vnder the charge of Antigonus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres, and some variance happening betwixt him and his Tutor, hee was left to the dispose of himselfe: and his vncle Honorius leauing at his death great troubles vnquenched in the West, the mightiest Potentates assayed to make themselues Emperours ouer seuerall Dominions, and from the richnesse of the Imperiall Diademe, each one sought to plucke a Iewell to beautifie his owne Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchie began the foundations of many succeeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandals, Suevians, and Alanes, not contented with their portion there assigned, betooke themselues to Armes. The Frankes and Burgundians, which had beene driuen out of France, resolued againe to returne. The Gothes, that were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, and Tolosa, did as the rest. The Hunnes entred Hungarie. Iohn the Tyran held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Newter: These stirres mooued Theodosius to nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperour in the West; whose raigne and affayres (so farre as they touch Britaine) wee will follow, being the last Romane Emperours that held out the succession of our British Monarkes.

Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperour: which Lady in the sacking of Rome by Alaricus the Gothe, was taken prisoner, & by him giuen in marriage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was King of that Nation; and by her sweete demeanour, and prudent meanes, a Peace was concluded betwixt her Husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Gothes, that they presently killed him, and raised one Wallia for their King; who likewise comming to composition with Honorius, deliuered Placidia according to Couenants, whom the Emperour her Brother bestowed in Marriage vpon Constantine his Generall, in regard of his good seruice and Victories by him atchieued.

(5) Shee, with yong Valentinian new made Emperour, being sent into Italie, selected the best approued Captaines to secure her sonnes Estate; whereof Aspar was one, that in Rome slew Iohn the Vsurper, who had there made himselfe Emperour, stamping this his face and stile vpon the currant Money of the State, and by his Tyrannies held his fortunes for fiue yeares continuance.

Aspar & Aetius chosen by her.

Ætius likewise, that had beene Gouernor of Spaine was imployed into Gallia, where the Frankes and Burgundians (vnder the conduct of Clodius their second King) sought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdome in that Countrey, giuing it the name of France, according to their owne, by which name they were neuer knowne to Cæsar, Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Mela, nor Ptolemy; whereby the great blast of their Antiquitie is shewed to be but a puffe of winde.

France not knowne to Cæsar by that name.

(6) At this time the Britaines were againe sore oppressed by the Scots and Picts, who hauing notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed ouer the Water in their Boates at both the ends of the Wall, and inuaded the Prouince with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Britaines in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadours to Rome, with their Garments rent, and dust vpon their heads, vnto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estates, and crauing his helpe. The Emperour mooued to remorse, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Britaine, vnder the Command of Gallio of Rauenna, a most valiant man; who hauing put backe the Enemie with the assistance of the Ilanders, gaue some small comforts to the distressed Britaines. But the Burgundians passing the Rhene, and threatning to waste Italie, Ætius was cõpelled to recall Gallio with his Legion, to secure the Country about Paris, whilest himselfe with his, followed the dangerous Enemie.

Britaines obtaine some small succour. Gallio sent to ayde them.

Burgundians threaten Italy. Gallio recalled, and the Britaines quite forsaken of the Romans.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Britaines that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painfull Iournies, neither at that time especially when their owne Empire was in danger to be ouer-ranne. Therefore hee willed them thenceforth or to stand vpon their Guard and to prouide for their owne safeties: and to that end, in regard of their good seruices done to the Romans, hee taught them the vse of their Armour and Weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification and Wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, laid eight foot in thicknesse, and twelue foote in height. This Wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publike charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarkes, and raising Turrets, with conuenient spaces distant one from another; which gaue a faire and farre prospect into the Sea. And so the Romans gaue a finall Farewell, meaning neuer to returne againe; and burying part of their Treasures here in the Earth, whereof much hath beene found, & more is still sought, left Britaine about the yeare of Christ fiue hundred, after the first inuasion thereof made vnder the conduct of Iulius Cæsar.

I omit to speake of those other Numbers of men sent for out of this Kingdome by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention; besides the sending of Vrsula with Eleuen thousand Virgins to be matched in mariage with these their Country-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning hither againe; whereby the bane of the Land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and depriued of wonted Posterities.

And these Souldiers thus withdrawne, are so recorded by Henry of Huntington his ancient; and Ninius also long before both, reporteth that Maximus gaue many Countries to these his Britaines, euen from the Poole which is on the Top of Inpiters Hill, to a Citie called Cantguic, and vnto the Western Mountaines. These (saith he) are the Britaines in Armorica, who neuer returned to this day, in regard whereof Britaine was conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeth Geruasius a Monke of Canterburie, Iohn Anglicus, Ranulphus Chester, and others. Thither also in the downfall and desperate Estate of the Britaines, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as he that was borne in Armorica, and liued neerest to that age, euen the Writer of the Life of S. Wingualof the Confessor, doth sufficiently proue. An offspring (saith he) of the Britaines embarked in Flotes, arriued in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons, fierce in Armes, and vnciuill in manners, possessed their Natiue and Mother Soyle, &c.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britaines were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmsbury writing of these times, saith, that the Romans had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chiualry of Warre, leauing now in her Countries but Halfe-barbarous men, and in her Cities onely Epicures, vnfit for seruice. (12) No maruell is it then if Britaine lay weake, being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approued Records make so apparant, as we need not alledge the doubtfull Story of Irpus of Norway, for the depopulation of the Iland, who is said by subtilty vnder pretence of Kindred, and Honour to be atchieued, to haue gotten an infinite number of Britains to follow him in his enterprise, which neuer returned againe: or the Booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of great Britaine, that bringeth an army hence, consisting in number of one & twenty thousand men into Aquitain and Gaul: which as he saith, was the ayd mentioned by Cæsar, that out of Britaine assisted the Gaules against him. Which may partly seeme to be gathered from Cæsar himselfe, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britaines and Gaules were gouerned vnder the same King: and is further confirmed by the fashion and Inscriptions of Antique Coines, which wee haue seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and Shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reuerse; a Forme infallible to bee of the Britaines Coines, and the word Comes inscribed vpon the Imbossed side, wee imagine to bee the same Gouernour of Artoys in Gallia, whom Cæsar mentioneth.

(13) Thus then was Britaine first made weake by the Romanes exhaustings, and then quite abandoned of their helpe, and left as a tree in the Wilderneſſe, to lose her faire leaues by the continuall blasts of these sharp Northerne windes, whose beauty before had been as the Cæsars of Libanon, or like vnto those in the Garden of God. Britaine abandoned of the Roman Garrisons.

THe Britaines thus abandoned of all the Romane Garrisons, and emptied of strengths that should haue supported her now down-falling-estate, lay prostrate to confusion and miserable calamities; no lesse burdened with the tumultuous vproares of her owne great men, who stroue for the supreme Gouernment, then of the Barbarous Nations which with continuall incursions made spoyle where they came. These times (saith Ninius) were full of feares, and were prolonged with fortie yeares afflictions: wherein Vortigern then King was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the dreads of the Picts and Scots, and the oppositions of Aurelius Ambrosius, who suruiuing his slaine Parents, that had worne the Imperiall Purple Robe, sought their reuenge vpon their wicked murderer: besides the Intrusions of the Germane Saxons, called in for Friends, but proued indeed the greatest Enemies. During the conflict of these tempestuous stormes, some small comforts were ministred vnto the Britains by Bishop German his presence, who from France assisted them against the Pelagian Heresies, and the perilous assaults of the Scots and Picts, who in diuers skirmishes ouercame them.

(2) These dolorous times of Britaines destruction, Gildas the mournefull Historian, who liued not long after, doth declare. As soone as the Romans (saith he) had left Britaine, and were returning vnto their home, forthwith hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came swarming out of their Carroghes, (wherein they passed the *Scitick Vale) like whole armies of duskish vermine, which at high noone, when the Sunne is in his greatest heat, began to crawle forth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hideous Scots and Picts; which two kindes of people, though in conditions somewhat different, yet they consorted too well in greedy desire of bloud-shed: and hauing intelligence, the associates of Britaine were now returned with vtter disclaime of further assistance; with more confident boldnesse then euer before, they seize all the Northerne and vttermost part of the Iland, as if it had beene their own inheritance, euen as farre as to the Wall. Against these attempts there were ranged in the high Forts along the Wall, Garrisons of Souldiers, but such as were both slothfull slothfull, and also vnseruiceable for Martiall Affaires: which white-liuered Lozels with quaking hearts sate still warding day & night, till their ioynts were as benummed and stupid as the stones whereon they sate: in so much as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the wall those miserable Warders, dashing their bodies against the ground. This good yet they got by their vntimely deaths, that being thus suddenly dispatched out of the world, they escaped the imminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children shortly felt. To be short, hauing abandoned their Cities and this high defensiue Wall, once more they tooke themselues to flight, and were dispersed in a more desperate manner then euer before. For the enemy was more hot in pursuit, and more cruell in the slaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their Enemies massacred, and rent in peeces like Lambs in the hands of bloudy Butchers, or in the jawes of cruell and sauage Beasts. In these most miserable times, (necessitie so compelling) the poore distressed people forbare not to rob each other of that sustenace, which could helpe them but for a very small season: and so their hostile oppressions were increased by their domesticke vexations, for that the whole Country by these continuall direptions, was vtterly depriued of the staffe of food, hauing nothing left to prolong their life, but that only what they got in hūting. Wherupon, about the thirty-nine yere of Theodosius, and of Christ foure hundred fortie six, the distressed Remaines of the down-cast Britaines addressed their missiue Letters to Ætius, whom Gildas calleth Agitius, President of Gallia, in most lamentable manner, and thus inscribed.

"The Barbarians driue vs back to the Sea; "the Sea againe putteth vs backe vpon the "Barbarians: thus betweene two kindes of "deaths, wee are either slaughtered or drowned. And the more to intimate their miseries, and to mooue his assistance, thus they further vrge: We (say they) are the Remnant that suruiue of the Britaines, and are your Subiects, who besides the Enemy, are afflicted by famine and mortalitie, which at this present extreamely rageth in our Land. And putting him in minde that it much importeth the Maiesty of the Romane Empire to protect and succour their Prouince, seeing it had now stood vpō the point of fiue hundred yeares vnder their obedience, whose strength of Souldiers taken from thence to serue their Emperours in their Warres else-where, was now decayed, and their wealths wasted by maintaining their many Legions in their owne Land and abroad: All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieue, hauing enough to doe to vphold their owne; but returned them againe with heauy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselues free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent floud brake thorow the Prouince, and bare downe all before them; the Inhabitants flying like chased Deere, some taking ouer Seas into Britany in France; some to South-Wales, North-Wales, Cornwall, and parts of Deuon-shire, leauing the best of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which neuer after they enjoyed.

(4) But the grieuous Famine still increasing, though it had this wofull issue with some, that it made them yeelde themselues into the Enemies bloudy hands (onely in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present,) and for many yeares after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great desolations wrought by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; insomuch as from out of the Mountaines, Caues, and thicke Woods, they assailed their enemies, reposing their trust not in Man, but in God, whose helpe is then most at hand, when mans helpe faileth. These in many skirmishes gaue them the ouerthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeares together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoyle: which caused these Rauening Irish to returne home; and the Picts a while rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Britaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong now daily repressing the Enemie, but stronger in their owne sinnes and ciuill dissensions. By meanes whereof, though a surcease of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine cleerly skinned vp, yet another sore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, & shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wastes, yeelded such plentie and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene; and therewithall such riot and excesse, that the peoples sinnes grew to a plentifull haruest, as by the words of Gyldas is apparant.

Great sinnes among the Britaines.

(5) Certainly it is heard (said he) that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated: Lies with the Forgers thereof highly esteemed. Euill is entertained for good, lewdnesse respected more then vprightnesse, darknesse desired before the bright Sunne, and Satan accepted for an Angell of light: Kings then were annointed, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in crueltie; & as cruelly againe by their anointers were they murdered, not for any demerit, but that they might aduance others more sauage then the former. If he were milde, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were on euery side levelled against him, as the onely Subuerter of the Britaines Estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, sauing that the better things commonly wrought most discontent: so that rightly the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced vnto the people in old time, might be applied to our Country: Yee lawlesse and corrupt children haue forsaken the Lord, & prouoked vnto wrath the holy one of Israel. why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquitie? Euery head is sicke, and euery heart is heauy: from the sole of the foot vnto the crowne of the head, there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their safetie, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that truest Physitian of all, was needlesse for the world. And not onely the prophaner sort did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord, and the Shepheards thereof, who ought to haue giuen example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay senslesse and weltring in wine, swelling with pride, contention, and griping enuie, putting no difference in iudgement betweene good and euill: insomuch that it seemeth, cõtempt was powred forth both vpon Princes and people: and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errours and by-paths, not led in the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his Familie, and to recure them thus infected with the corruptions of sinnes: by heare-say only of Tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tryed rumor pierced the attentiue eares of all men, giuing notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arriue, and fully minded to destroy them vtterly, and to inhabit (as earst they did) the whole Countrey from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaime them, but like vnto mad horses, which taking the bit fast betwixt their teeth, runne away with their Riders, so these leauing the way that leadeth (narrow though it be) vnto saluation, ran at randome in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Salomon saith) the stubborne seruant will not be amended with words, he is scourged for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagion fell heauily vpon this foolish people, which (though the enemies sword was gone) in short space destroyed such multitudes of them, that the liuing were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they therby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to baldnesse, and sackecloth: but behold, they fell to killing of calues, and to slaying of Rammes: loe, they went to eating & drinking, and said withall, Let vs eat and drinke, for to morrow we shall die. And indeed the time now drew nere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amorites) should come to the fulnesse. And euen at that instant the like measure beganne to be heaped vpon the Britaines.

(6) For the common enemie now inuading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford vpon the Riuer Welland; whom to resist, the Britaines assembled together, and hauing experience what ciuill jarres had formerly done, they joyntly vnite their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Vortigerne, by birth extracted from the British Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices blemished the same. The British Historie saith, that he was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the dayes of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie he much abused, and whom lastly hee caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Picts by him so placed, and to that end instigated; whom neuertheless with death he seuerely punished, to auoyd further suspition. (7) The occasion and manner of this their inuiting and comming, is set downe by a Countriman of their owne Witichindus, a Writer of good Antiquitie, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Britaine (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Prouinces, and held in their subiection, stood ſtood them in no ſmall ſtead: but their Legions abandoned; and deſtinie (as it ſeemeth) determining the downefall, became ſoone aſſaulted by their neighbour Nations the Northerne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Emperor* Martiall was ſlaine by his Souldiers, being tired out with forraine wars, were not able to aſſiſt their friends with ſupply of accuſtomed aydes. And yet had they built a mightie peece of worke for the defence of the Country, reaching betweene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would aſſaile the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them ſo fiercely bent, and euer ready to make warre (eſpecially where they dealt with a Nation feebled and left vnable to make reſiſtance) to deſtroy the ſaid worke. Therefore hearing of the worthy and fortunate exploits atchieued by the Saxons, they ſent an humble Embaſſage to require their ayde; and theſe hauing audience, ſpake as followeth.

Hereupon (according to promiſe) an army was ſent into Britain, and ioyfully receiued, which in ſhort time freed the Land from the ſpoiling enemies, and recouered the Country vnto the behoofe of the Inhabitants.

Saxons good ſeruice at their firſt cõming.

(8) But how true this laſt clauſe is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To repreſſe (ſaith he) many Inuaſions of thoſe their ancient enemies, which with cruell ſlaughters and booties continually afflicted them, the Britaines fell to conſult vpon ſome conuenient courſe therein to be taken. Laſtly, all the Counſellers, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in iudgement, deuiſed ſuch a protection, as in the end proued their Countries deſtruction; namely, that thoſe fierce Saxons, a people ſauage and of hatefull name, odious both to God and man, ſhould be let into this Iland, as it were wolues into ſheepe-folds, to repulſe (forſooth) the Northerne Nations: then whith proiect doubtleſſe nothing was euer more pernicious and vnhappy vnto this Land, O ſenſes ſenſleſſe and plunged into deepeſt miſts of errour! deſperate dulneſſe, and blinde blockiſhneſſe of minde! Thoſe who in abſence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are inuited by theſe Princes of Ægypt (if I may ſo ſay, thus ſottiſhly counſelling their Pharao) to come and reſt with them vnder one roofe. Preſently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lioneſſe ruſhed forth a kennell of her whelpes, in three long veſſels, called in their Language Cyulæ, carried vnder full ſayle, and with ominous preſages fore-prophecying that for three hundred yeares they ſhould poſſeſſe that Land vnto which they then directed their courſe, and for halfe of that ſpace, (viz. one hundred and fiftie yeares) they ſhould waſte and depopulate the ſame. Theſe being put on ſhore firſt in the Eaſt part of the Iland, and that by Commandement of this vnfortunate Tyrant, there ſet faſt their terrible pawes, pretending to the Ilanders, defence of their Country, but more truly intending the deſtruction of them. The foreſaid Lioneſſe finding that her firſt troupe of whelpes ſped ſo well, ſends againe a greater Rabble of the ſame Litter, which heere arriued in Flotes, bringing with them ſome other Aſſociates of baſtardly and vnnoble brood. And theſe beginnings, the ſlips of iniquitie, and the roots of bitterneſſe, (an accurſed plantation well befitting our demerits) haue ſprung vp, and put forth in our ſoyle their haughtie boughs and ſpreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, profeſſing themſelues our Souldiers, and ſuch as would endure all hazards (ſo they fained) in defence for their good Hoſts, firſt they craued ſupplie of victuals onely; which being giuen them, for ſome time ſtopped (as wee may ſay) the Dogs mouth: howbeit, afterward they complaine that their wages was not bountifully enough paid, deuiſing of purpoſe colourable occaſions of quarrell, and threatning that vnleſſe they might haue more munificent entertainment, they would with the breach of couenant ſpoyle* ſpoile and waſt the whole Iland. And without further delay, they ſecond theſe threats with deeds (for our Sinnes, the cauſe of deſerued reuenge, were ſtill nouriſhed) and the fire kindled Eaſt-ward, was ſet a flaming by theſe ſacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, ceaſing not to conſume all the Cities and Countries bordering thereabout, vntill ſuch time as burning well-neere all the In-land Soyle of the Iland, it licked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Weſterne Ocean it ſelfe. In this violent inuaſion, comparable to that of the Aſſyrians againſt the Land of Iſrael in old times, is hiſtorically fulfilled alſo in vs, that which the Prophet by way of ſorrowfull lamentation vttereth: They haue ſet fire vpon thy holy places, and haue burned the dwelling place of thy Name, euen vnto the ground. And againe: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple haue they defiled: for all the Fortifications demoliſhed with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Biſhops of the Church, and alſo the Prieſts and people, with glittering ſwords and crackling flames, were all at once laid along vpon the ground, yea and (which was a moſt lamentable ſpectacle) the ſtately Turrets, high mounted Walles, and the ſacred Altars, lay all tumbling together (all purpled with the broken and bloudy Quarters and goared Carcaſes, mixed as in a horrible wine-preſſe. Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, ſaue the ruines of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beaſts and birds.

(9) During this moſt wofull, deſperate, and tempeſtuous ſeaſon (ſaith the mournfull Hiſtorian) ſome poore Remaines of Britaines being found in the Mountaines, were ſlaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yeelded themſelues vnto their enemies, vpon compoſition to ſerue them as Bond-ſlaues for euer, ſo they might not be ſlaughtered out of hand: which granted, was reputed a moſt high and eſpeciall grace. Others went ouer Seas into Strange Lands, ſinging vnder their ſpread Sailes with a lamentable and mourning note, that of the Pſalmiſt: Thou haſt giuen vs, O Lord, as Sheepe to bee deuoured, and haſt ſcattered vs among the Heathen. Yet others remained ſtill in their owne Country (albeit in fearefull eſtate, and continually ſuſpecting hazard) committing their liues and ſafetie to the high ſteepe Hilles, to craggy Mountaines naturally intrenched, to thick growne Woods and Forreſts, yea and to the Rockes of the Sea.

In which time you ſee they were moſt cruelly purſued with all calamities of warre, and laſtly betrayed by them in whom ſo much truſt was repoſed, as mournfull Gildas hath ruefully declared.

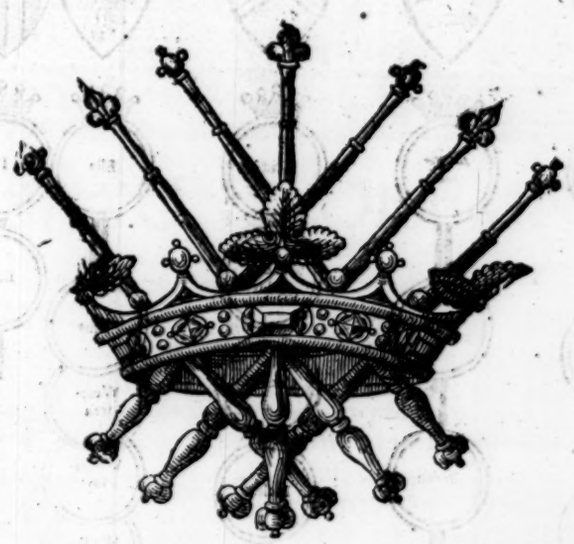
THE



THE ROYALL STEM OF THE SAXONS, FROM PRINCE WODEN AND HIS WIFE FREA; BRANCHED VNTO THEM THAT FIRST LAID THE HEPTARCHY OF GREAT BRITAINE.

BEfore wee enter into the diſcourſe of thoſe SAXONS, that by ſubtilty firſt ſought, and by ſtrength at laſt obtained the faire inheritance of great Britaines Crowne, let vs firſt ſhew from what ancient Stemme theſe ſeauen faire branches tooke ſappe of growth or beginning: that ſo the eye may be led, and the minde delight, to view, and to reade the manners of them, that ſince Noah, Gomer, and Iauan, are of ſureſt record, to be our knowne parents. And from this tree-like body behold the boughes that grew and aſpired to the height of their own wiſhed glory: laying the foundation of their ſeuen Kingdomes in Great Britaines Iland; which no ſooner was enioyed, but each of them ſought by his owne, to ouer-ſhadow the next, vntill Fortune and Warre brought all into one. And by the ſucceſſors of that one, the Crowne is ſtill worne, for fame and continuance farre fairer then any.

Theſe Saxons thus branched, by Florentius Monke of Worceſter, is brought from Prince Woden their deified Mars, and from Fria his Princeſſe, by them adored for the goddeſſe Venus: and that with no little imaginations of both their great powers. I need not to commend the credit of this Monke, ſeeing Bale in his Centuries, 66. hath done it before me; and time the touch-ſtone of truth hath ſet him ſo neere vnto their times, that his life might well touch the liues of ſome of theſe Saxons: for he wrote in the dayes of King Henry the firſt, and dyed in the yeere of grace a thouſand one hundred and nineteene; being the firſt recorder of our Normane Stories, and the directer of all after-followers. See therefore from him (if you pleaſe) theſe SAXONS deſcents: and from him, and others their originals, manners, religions, lawes and names: reſeruing the cretdit thereof vnto them; but the errors and paines to our ſelfe.

THE SAXONS ORIGINALL.

CHAPTER II.

AS times decayed Ruines haue ſtopped the Paſſage of thoſe ſmal ſprings, iſſued frō the firſt fountaine of Nations beginnings, and haue diuerted their ſtreames farre from any ſure courſe, or certaine knowne Heads; ſo the originall parent, place, and name of our Engliſh Saxons, haue beene written with a pen of ſlight touch vpon the leaues of obliuion, or elſe recorded in thoſe obſcure Rowles, that as yet lie bound vp in the Office of times forgetfulneſſe: whereby it reſts doubtfull from what roote theſe branches firſt ſprang; ſome bringing them from Aſia, ſome from Africa, ſome from Macedon, ſome from Denmarke, and ſome without all likelyhood from Britaine it ſelfe.

Saxons, the vncertainty from whence they came.

Occa Scarlenſis a Friſlander borne, affirmeth theſe Saxons to come of Saxo a Prince of India, who with his two brethren were baniſhed by lot to ſeeke their deſtinies abroad, their owne Countries being peſtered with ouer-many people at home. Theſe (ſaith he) following Alexander the Great into Greece, became Progenitors to their Countries, that from them receiued their off-ſpring and names: as that from Friſco the eldeſt, his Friſlanders deſcended; from Saxo the ſecond the Saxons vpon the Riuer Albis, and from Bruno the yongeſt, the Inhabitants of the Dukedome of Brunſwic. And of this opinion alſo Sufridus Petri ſeemeth to be. Crantzius doth deriue them from the Catti in Germany and the Phrygians a Region in Aſia; to omit others, who would bring them from Saxo the brother of Vandale.

Saxons from Sacæ a people in Aſia.

(2) F. Albinus a learned Author, doth thinke the Saxons to be deſcended from Sacæ, a people in Aſia, and that afterward in proceſſe of time they came to be called Saxons; as if it were written Saxſons, as much to ſay as, The ſonnes of the Sacæ. To this opinion Maſter Henry Ferrers, a Gentleman of ancient deſcent, great reading, & a judicious Antiquary agreeeth; whoſe judgement for my particular, I haue alwayes honoured, and from the Progeny of his Engliſh Monarchs haue taken my principall proceeding in theſe Saxon Succeſſors.

(3) As touching the ancient place of their aboad, Ptolemy the Alexandrian placeth the people Saſones in the Inner Scythia, betwixt the Mountaines Alani and Tapuri; and Amianus Marcellinus ſiteth the Sacæ (no doubt the very ſame) a fierce and ſauage Nation, to inhabit ouer-grown places, commodious onely for Cattell, at the foote of the Mountaines Aſcanimia and Comedus, neere vnto which the Citie Alexandria, Tribatra and Drepſa were adioyning, and are ſo ſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe probable that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Sacæ in Aſia, then the Germans from thoſe Germans in Perſia, of whom Herodotus writeth. And Ioſeph Scaliger, a renowned Author, ſheweth, that theſe words fader, moder, brader, tutcher, hand, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tongue in the ſame ſenſe, as we vſe Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bound, &c. a great inducement (as ſome thinke) for the Saxons originall from thoſe parts; though in my opinion the Latine, Pater, Mater, Frater, haue no leſſe affinitie of ſound, and in all likelihood were the Primitiues to theſe of ours. Of theſe Sacæ Strabo writeth that they made Inuaſions into Countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their ſucceſſe in a part of that Country, by calling it Sacacena, after their own name.

Saxons comming into Europe.

(4) From these parts of Asia, as Scythia and the rest, one Band of them, consisting chiefly of their Youth, proceeded by degrees into Europe, and possessed the Nesse, or Forcland, which the Romans called Cimbrica Chersonesus, being at this day the continent part of the Kingdome of Denmarke. In which place they were first knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here also they among themselues beganne first to be distinguished into other Tribes, as Holt-Saxons (for so Verstegan, out of their old Chronicle, saith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods: but more properly (wee may say) into Saxons, Angles, and Iutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and passing ouer the Riuer Elbe, diuided themselues into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the vpper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themselues into the ancient Seat of the Suevians, which now of them is called Westphalia and Saxony: and the other incroched vpon Friseland and Holland (then called Batauia) with the rest of those Countries that lie along the German Seas:

(5) The time wherein these Saxons should thus infest Germany, by Occa Scarlensis verdict, is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Tiberius. But before Ptolemy we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flourished in the dayes of Antoninus Pius, about the yeare from Christs Natiuitie an hundred & forty. And most certaine it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeare three hundred, when Diocletian swayed the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbrica Chersonesus sore offended the coasts of Britain and France, with their many piracies, and were fearefull euen to the Romans themselues. These multiplying in number & strength, seated in the Maritime tract of Iutland, Sleswick, Holsatia, Ditmarse, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Friesland and Holland: and indeede, according to the Testimony of Fabius Quæstor, wholly all the Sea-coasts from the riuer Rhene vnto the Citie Donia, which now is commonly called The Denmarc; and with him Henry of Erfurd affirmeth Saxonland to stretch from the Riuer Albis vnto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the Germanes extending any way so farre, saith he.

(6) But these spreading Boughes, are brought by others from a neerer Roote, planted not in Asia, or Scythia, but rather in Europe and in Germany it selfe; grounding their opinion from Cornelius Tacitus, who maketh them to be bred in the same Country, though distinguished by Name from the rest, as others more beside there were. Which Saxons (say they) though they were not mentioned by Tacitus in his Description of Germany, yet in Ptolemy, that wrote not much aboue fortie yeares after him, they are named, as also the Guta and the Angli, Copartners of their Conqueſt, Tacitus placeth among these Germanes that worshipped Herthum the Mother-earth for their Auowrie Goddesse; At first but one People, but afterwards diuided into three seuerall Tribes; that is, the Saxons, Angles, and Iutes, who left the remembrance of their Names stamped (as it were) in the soyle from whence they departed, and also coyned new vnto others, whereof they became possessours.

(7) Ptolemy, among the Suevians in Germanie placeth the Saxons, neere to the mouth of the Riuer Albis, in the continent of Cimbria Chersonesus. And in this Iland of Britaine, Beda telles vs that the Kingdomes of the East and West Saxons were of them peopled: Whose originall Name, besides the Indian Saxo or the Scythian Sacæ, some will haue Etymologed from Saxum a Stone, because forsooth these people were heard or Stonie-hearted; and some againe from the Axones in Gallia, of whom Lucan maketh mention in this his Verse:

(8) Iustus Lipsius coniectureth, and Engelhusius affirmeth (as Verstegan saith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Fashion of the Weapon that vsually they wore; which was a Crooked Bowing Sword, somewhat like vnto a Sithe, with the edge on the contrarie side, called by the Netherlanders, a Saisen, and by themselues Seaxen; and the shorter of like fashion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; such as were those that were hid vnder their Garments in the Massacre of the British Nobilitie vpon Salisbury Plaine, when Hengist gaue the watch-word, Nem eour Seaxes, that is, Take you Swords: three of which Knives Argent, in a Field Gules, were borne by Erkenwyne King of the East Saxons, vpon his shield of Armes, as

as ſome of our Heralds haue imblazed. And that their Name was ſo giuen them from their Weapons, ſome allege their accuſtomed manner in wearing thereof, which vſually was to truſſe the ſame ouerthwart their backes when they went forth to Battle; whereby notice was taken, and that name attributed vnto them, as the like hath beene vpon like occaſion vnto others: for ſo in Aſia the Scythians were named for their skill in ſhooting; in France the Picards for their long Pikes vſed in fight; and in Ireland the galloglaſſes, which bare the Pollax as their principall weapon: and of latter times, vpon leſſe occaſions haue Surnames growne both to particular men, as alſo to whole Societies; which may appeare in ſuch as hauing vowed their voyage and ſeruice for Ieruſalem, wore continually vpon their backes a red Croſſe, whereby the name Croſſe-back, or in old Engliſh, Crouch-back, was to them attributed: in which ranke, Edmund Earle of Lancaſter (ſecond ſonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which hee could not claw off from his backe euer ſince. So likewiſe thoſe men who entred that Religion of Monaſticall life, wore vſually vpon the outſide of their Garments the ſigne of a Croſſe, whereby that Order was diſtinguiſhed and noted from others by the name of Crouched or Croſſed Fryers. But whence or howſoeuer the name aroſe, among all the Germans there were none in reputation for military deeds comparable vnto theſe Saxons: neither had any aduentured by Sea and Land, ſo farre to purchaſe renowne and prayſe, or perhaps (and that more likely) to ſupply their own wants, ranging often from place to place, as men alwaies ready to enter any action: and in Germanie to this day a great Dukedome retaineth from them the name of Saxonie.

This varietie of names wee will no further inforce, then that theſe Gothes were not the ſame that had paſſed Iſter by Pontus Euxinus, and ouerran Europe, who were alſo called the Getæ by Iohn Maior. Their name, as Verſtegan will haue it, was taken from their agilitie, or ſwiftneſſe of foot: and ſome of them (as Sebaſtian Munſter declareth) went and inhabited among the Mountaines that diuide Germanie from Italie, whereupon their name grew to be called the Hil-Vites, which are now the Heluetians.

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Quæſtor Ethelwardus, an ancient Writer, and a Noble Perſon of the Saxons Royall Bloud; are brought from Old Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the Countries of the Saxons & the Giots, as he writeth them, whoſe chiefe Towne was by them called Sleſwick, and of the Danes, Haithby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the city Flemburge and the Riuer Sly, which Country by Albertus Crantzius is called Anglia. From hence (ſaith Henricus Rantzonius) the Saxons, who were alſo called the Angle-Saxons, went to ayde the Britaines. And at this day there is a little Prouince in the Kingdome of Dania, named Angell, beneath the Citie Flemburge, which Lindebergus calleth Little Anglia. Their ſite notwithſtanding is placed by moſt Authors in Weſtphalia, where the Citie Engern ſtandeth, and where Tacitus and Ptolemie rangeth them among the Sueuians; which in their times might very well be. Others would haue them in Pomerania, where the Towne Engloen doth ſomwhat ſound their name: ſo doe Engelheim, Engleburg, and Engleruite, places in Germanie, beare witneſſe, and are prints of their footing among the Longobards and Sueuians. But the moſt glorious remembrance of that their name hath beene for theſe many ages in this Kingdome of England: though Saxo Grammaticus (as erſt we touched, Lib. 5. Cap. 2.) will needs haue Anglia named from Angul the ſonne of Humblus, and Giantlike brother of Danus the firſt King of Denmarke. But Albertus Crantzius being offended at his folly, telles him that England had the name of Britain many hundred yeeres after that Angul was dead. Others there are that deriue the name England from the manner of this Ilands ſituation, being narrow in the Weſt and North, for that Eng in the ancient Teutonick Tongue, as well as in the moderne, doth ſignifie Narrow, Strait, or a Nooke; and to that purpoſe doe produce this verſe of a Portugals alluſion.

(12) Theſe all claime their deſcents from Prince Woden; called by the ancient Latines Othinus; and who is deduced by our Antiquaries, as hath beene ſaid, from the eldeſt Sonne of the Patriarke Noah, and is accounted the moſt noble of all the Progenitors of the Saxon Kings, inſomuch as they, and eſpecially the Angle-Saxons, our Anceſtors, haue (in their ſuperſtitious conceit of ſuch wooden gods) imagined Woden to be their principall god of Battle; whoſe Wife named Frea, was by the like fancy held a goddeſſe, of whom more hereafter.

Saxons both Angles & Iutes deſcend from Woden.

Woden eſteemed a god. Frea the wife of Woden.

(13) Theſe had iſſue betweene them ſundry ſonnes, and from fiue of them, all the Monarches of the Engliſh-men haue claimed to haue beene deſcended; Wechta the firſt, being reported to be the Progenitor to the Kings of the Kentiſhmen: Caſar the ſecond, to the Kings of the Eaſt-Angles: Wethelgeat the third, to the Kings of the Mercians: Wegdeg the fourth, to the Kings of the Dierians: and Beldeg the fift, to the Kings of the South-Saxons, to the Kings of the Bernicians, afterwards Kings of Northumberland; and alſo the Kings of the Weſt-Saxons. This may ſuffice for the Originals of theſe three people; who, as Ciſner affirmeth, retained ſtill the ſame manners after they were ſeated in Europe, as they had formerly done in Aſia. And what thoſe were; let vs heare the reports of Tacitus, and other ancient Authors, who together with the Germans (among whom they dwelled) doe thus deſcribe them.

CHAPTER III.

Crantzius.

Tacit. in deſcript of Germanie.

Witichindus, lib. 9 cap. 2. Saxons deſcribed.

THeſe Germans, and among them the Catti and Suenians, our Anceſtors (according to Albertus Crantzius) were a people (ſaith Tacitus) well ſet, ſterne of countenance, tall of ſtature, gray eyed, and of a ſirie aſpect, and their haire yellow. Vnto whom, Witichindus the Monke addeth and ſaith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerefull of countenance, very comely of ſtature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned; bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (ſaith he) the Frankes had them in great admiration, and wondred at their new and ſtrange attire, their armour and their buſhie lockes of haire, that from their heads ouer-ſpred their ſhoulders; but aboue all, at their conſtant reſolution and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they ſuffer (ſaith Tacitus) to grow at length, and neuer put off that vowed ornament and bond of valour, vntill they haue ſlaine an enemie: but then vpon blood and ſpoyle, they vncouer their forehead, and ſay they haue payed backe the price of their birth, and and thinke themselues worthy of their Country and Parents. Their curled locks (saith he) they bind vp in knots, and standing on end, tie it in the crowne onely, that is the harmelesse care they haue of beautie, to seeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his testimony, they vsed to shaue off the haire of their heads, reseruing onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hoope or plate of copper, which caused the haire to stand vpright, as by these his Verses appeareth.

Sidonius Apollin.

Istic Saxona cærulum videmus,

Cuius verticis extimas per oras,
Non contenta suos tenere morsus,
Altat lamina marginem comarum:
Et sic crinibus ad cutem reciſis
Decreſcit caput, additurq; vultus.

In English thus:

There doe we see the Saxon, clad in blew,
Bold on the Sea, but fearfull now on land:
Their heighted tops vpon their crownes that shew,
Are not content to hold their wonted band,
But raised in tufts, where all the rest, doth stand
Bare necked shau'd, and hath no haire at all,
Which makes full fac'd, but heads seeme passing small.

(2) And that they were indeede bold vpon the Seas, Ægysippus witnesseth: The Saxons (saith he) a most valorous kinde of men, excell all others in Piracies. In imitation whom, Isidore affirmeth, that for their valour and nimblenes in seruice they had their name. A people (saith he) stout, hardie, and most valiant, and farre out-stripping all others in Piracies, seemed more fearfull to liue on Land then at Sea. Whose intrusions and sudden violence both France and Britaine with great dammages felt: for in Gallia they seized into their possession the Country of * Baiocasses as is to be seene in Gregorius Turonensis, who thence termeth them Saxones Baiocasions*: and in Britaine an Office of Charge was instituted to defend the Coasts from their irruptions, the Captain whereof was commonly called the Count or Earle of the Saxons Shoare: of whose Piracies and sauage Cruelties, let vs heare Sidonius in his Epistle to Numantius complaine: So many Rowers as you see (saith he) so many Arch-Pirats thinke you behold, they all of them together so command, obey, teach and learne, to rob and steale. There is no enemie so cruell as this, that setteth vpon others at vnawares, and as occasion serues, as warily slips himselfe away. He setteth at nought such as encounter him: he bringeth to nought those that take no heed of him: whom he courseth, he surely ouertaketh: when he flieth, he is sure to escape. To this seruice, shipwrackes inure him, they terrifie him not. Be there a tempest vp, the same serueth them, and to assaile others. They neuer weigh Anchour vpon the enemies Coasts, but with a resolution againe to returne: and their manner is to kill euery tenth Captaine with a lingring & dolorous torment: for to such Vowes they binde themselues, and with such sacrifices they discharge their Vowes againe, being indeed not so much purified by such Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacriledge: and the bloudy and abominable Murtherers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Prisoner vnto death, then to set him free for a Ransome.

But when wee shall heare these vnhumane and barbarous reports either of the old Britaines, or these sauage Saxons our ancient Progenitors, let vs neither be offended at Gildas, or at the reports of these other forrain Writers, who spake thus of them as they were then Heathens, and knew not God: the time of whose ignorance seeing God regarded not, as the Apostle teacheth, let vs acknowledge with due thankes the goodnesse of a most gracious God, who hath brought vs to a holier conuersation, and hath made vs judges of those sinnes in them, that we might flie them in our selues.

Act. 17. 30.

An Admonition to the Reader.

(3) Their Apparell was much different from others, and seemed strange to the Gaules, as Witichindus hath told vs: and Tacitus declareth the manner thereof; which (saith he) was a kinde of Cassocke, called Sagum, clasped, or (for want of a clasp) fastned with a thorn, hauing otherwise no garments at all, but going starke naked. Neuertheless, the richer sort were distinguished from others, by their garments which were neither large nor wide, as the Sarmates and Parthians vse to weare them; but straite, and shewing the proportion of euerie part of their bodie: besides they wore Pelts made of beasts skins. The Man and Womans attire differed in nothing, saith he, saue that the women vse linnen Garments trimmed trimmed and interlaced with Purple, and without ſleeues, their armes bare, and boſomes naked and vncouered. Yet Paulus Diaconus ſpeaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, ſaith, that their Caſſockes were large and worne looſe, moſt of linnen, trimmed and ſet out with very broad Gards or welts purfleet, and embrodered with ſundry colours, and the richer ſort with Pearles: their haire bound vp in a copper hoope, ſtood in tufts vpon the Crowne, the reſt curled and falling downe vpon their ſhoulders: their beards they kept ſtill vncut, till they had killed an enemy; and for another note of ignominie, they wore an Iron Ring, as a ſigne of bondage, till they had caſt it from them by the Conqueſt of a Man. Great Kniues, or rather broad bending Swords, they truſſed vpon little Shields thwart their backes, from which (as we ſhewed) Engelhuſius auoucheth they had their appellation. Hee that abandoned or loſt this Shield in Battle (ſaith Tacitus) was debarred from their publike Sacrifices and Aſſemblies, the greateſt diſgrace that could be; for very ſhame and griefe whereof, many, many times hanged themſelues. And vpon theſe Shields their manner was to lift vp their new elected Generall, and with acclamations ſo to carrie him thorow their Campe.

(4) For Warres, the Germans by Tacitus are reputed the beſt, who for two hundred & ten yeers held tack with the Romans. Not the Samnites (ſaith he) not the Carthaginians, not the Spaniards, or the Gallois, no not the Parthians haue ſo much troubled vs: for what can the Eaſt obiect againſt vs, ſauing the death of Craſſus, when he had defeated Pacorus, before trodden downe by Ventidius? But the Germans hauing either ſlaine or taken Carbo, and Caſſius, and Scaurus Aurelius, and Seruilius Cepio, and M. Manlius, haue defeated alſo fiue Conſulary Armies, and Varus with three Legiõs in Cæſars time. Neither haue C. Marius in Italie, or Iulius in Gallia, Druſus or Nero, and Germanicus moleſted them at home in their Country, but to their more ſmart. And yet theſe Saxons among thoſe valiant Germans were accounted the beſt for courage of mind, ſtrength of body, and enduring of trauell, as Zoſimus ſaith. Terrible alſo they were, and full of agilitie, by the report of Oroſius: and for their ſudden inuaſions, moſt feared of the Romans, ſaith Marcellinus.

(5) Their faſhion was to goe forth ſinging to the Warres, (or rather they eſpecially are ſaid to march to battle, whereas others are ſaid to goe) carrying before them certaine Images taken out of their conſecrated Woods. Their manner was before they ioyned Battle, to try by ſingle Combat (therein arming one of their owne againſt ſome captiued enemy) what ſucceſſe was to be expected: and this they kept as a Law vnuiolated, that none might preſume to beare Armes before he was ſolemnly admitted, where in a frequent Aſſemblie a Shield was giuen him by his Parents or Kindred: & this was the pledge (as it were) of his firſt honour, he being till then reputed but a particular of a Familie, but thence-forward a member of the Common-wealth. They are very ſenſible, wiſe, and conſiderate in their ſeruice, in preferring choice Captaines, in following their Leaders, in obſeruing their ranks, in taking the aduantage & benefit of the day, and intrenching in the night, holding Fortune euer doubtfull, but valour alwayes certaine. Their weapons, as teſtifieth Ioannes Pomarius, were long Speares, broad Swords, and the Croſ-bow: theſe they held in ſuch eſteeme, that with a horſe furniſhed, Shield, Sword, and Lance, their Virgins were receiued in mariage, accounting them for the greateſt bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which cuſtome might well be taken from their neighbours the ancient Saracens, whoſe Maidens vſually preſented to their husbands a Tent and a Speare, in way of Dowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. And among theſe Germans thoſe Martiall habiliaments were in ſuch vſe, that they did meet neither at Feaſts nor in Councell, but in their Armour.

A People (ſaith Tacitus) whom thou canſt not ſo eaſily perſwade to manure the ground, as to prouoke the Enemie, and aduenture wounds; holding ſmall eſteeme of that which is gotten by the ſweat of their browes; when it might haue beene obtained by the expence of their bloud. A ſtrange diuerſitie (ſaith he) that the ſame men ſhould ſo much loue ſloth, and hate quietneſſe. It is with them a great ſhame for their Prince to be ouercome in Valour; but for any one to returne aliue from that Battle wherein the Prince is ſlaine, a perpetuall infamy and reproach. And that their reſolutions were euer noble, and their courage not daunted in diſtreſſe or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symmachus, and deſigned for the Romans paſtime of Sword-players, who the ſame morning that this ſpectacle was expected, ſtrangled themſelues rather then they would incurre ſuch infamie and baſeneſſe, as to make others paſtime with the

(6) Their Lawes were ſeuere, and vices not laughed at, and good Cuſtomes of greater authority among them, then elſwhere were good Lawes; no temporiſing for fauour, nor vſury for gaine; but bounteous in hoſpitalitie, and liberall in gifts, accounting both due to be giuen and receiued, yea and that without thankes: No nation freer from adulterie, or puniſhing that ſinne more ſeuerely. For the woman offending, hauing firſt her haire cut off, was turned ſtarke naked out of her Husbands houſe, and that in preſence of her owne kindred; thence ſhee was ſcourged with whips thorow the Towne, without regard of birth, beautie, age or wealth, and neuer after could finde another Husband. Thoſe that were vnnaturally lewd of their bodies, their manner was to drowne them in filthy mud, and to couer them with hurdles. Yea and greater puniſhments then theſe the Pagan-Saxons executed vpon ſuch offenders, as by the Epiſtle of Boniface an Engliſh-man, Arch-biſhop of Magunce, which he wrote vnto Ethelbald King of the Mercians, in reproouing his adulterous life, is manifeſt. For (ſaith he) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledge of God) if either a Maid in her fathers houſe, or one hauing a Husband, became a whore, ſhe ſhould be ſtrangled with her owne hands cloſed to her mouth, and the Corrupter ſhould be hanged vpon the Pit wherein ſhee was buried. If ſhee were not ſo vſed, then her Garments being cut away downe from the Girdle-ſteed, tht chaſte Matrons did ſcourge and whip her, and did pricke her with knines, and ſo was ſhee ſent from Towne to Towne, where other freſh and new ſcourges did meet and torment her vnto death.

Chron. of Holland.

And their ſeuere Lawes a long time remaining in the dayes of Chriſtianitie, declare with what rigour (without regard of perſon) they both examined and puniſhed this offence: whereof that of Queen Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confeſſor, is a ſufficient example, who being accuſed for incontinency of body with Alwin Biſhop of Wincheſter, was enioyned to paſſe ouer nine Plough-ſhare Irons glowing red hot, ſhee being blindfold and barefooted; by which tryall ſhee is ſaid to haue acquited her ſelfe, in ſo much that hauing paſſed them all before ſhee knew it, cryed and ſaid; O good Lord, when ſhall I come to the place of my purgation? This puniſhment beginning in theſe Pagans, and continuing vnto the yeere 750. Stephen the ſecond, and moſt pontificall Pope of Rome, did vtterly aboliſh, as too ſeuere and ouer-rigorous for Chriſtians to vndergoe.

The Virgins of theſe Saxons were neuer to be married but once, that they might haue no other thoughts, nor further deſire but in caſe of Matrimony: neither had ỹ men plurality, excepting great Perſonages, and they ſued vnto in regard of procreation; for to be without Children, was to be without reputation. So that the teſtimony of Saluianus, which liued among them, fitteth well our purpoſe, ſaying; Though the Saxons are outragious in cruelties, yet for chaſtitie they are to be honoured.

The Saxons Virgins married but once.

(7) But as in theſe vertues they outſtripped moſt Pagans; ſo in the Zeale of their heatheniſh ſuperſtitions and Idolatrous ſeruice, they equalized any of them: for beſides Herthus, the Mother-Earth, whom the Angli our anceſtors accounted for a Goddeſſe of Ayde: they worſhipped Mercurie vnder the name of Woden for their principall God of Battell: after whoſe victories they vſually ſacrificed to him their Priſoners taken in warres, and of him named one of the weeke daies Wodenſday*, whereon he was chiefly worſhipped: whoſe wife named Frea, was by the like foolery held to be Venus a goddeſſe, vnto whom another of their weeke dayes was aſſigned for name and ſeruice; which of vs is called Friday.

Adam Bremenſis.

This generall defection of Gods true worſhip, Adam Bremenſis maketh mention of in this manner: In a Temple, ſaith he, *called in their vulgar and native ſpeech Vbſola, which is made altogether of Gold, the people worſhip the Statues of three gods, in ſuch manner, that as Thor the mightieſt of them hath onely a Throne or Bed: on either hand of him Woodan and Friſco hold their places. And thus much they ſignifie: Thor, ſay they, beareth rule in the Ayre, and gouerneth the Thunder and Lightning, Winds, Showres, Faire weather, Corne, and Fruits of the Earth. The ſecond, which is Woodan, that is, ſtronger, maketh Warres, and miniſtreth manly valour againſt Enemies. The third is Friſco, beſtowing largely vpon mortall men, peace and pleaſure, whoſe Image they deuiſe and pourtray with a great virile member. Woodan they engraue armed, like as we vſe to cut and expreſſe Mars.

(9) Their controuerſies and doubtfull matters were decided by drawing of Lots, which they euer made of ſome fruit-bearing tree, and was performed after this manner: If there were publike cauſe, the Prieſt; if priuate, the Goodman of the houſe, or worthieſt in the company, tooke thoſe ſlitted ſlips, diſtinguiſhed with certaine markes that had beene ſcattered at hap hazzard vpon a white garment: and after prayers and inuocation on their god, with eyes fixed vpon heauen, and three times lifting the ſame Lots aloft, gaue their interpretations thereof according to the markes therein inſcribed; which was receiued and beleeued for a moſt ſure Oracle: as the like was obſerued vpon other occaſions, both by the inſpections of Beaſts intrals, and ſingings of Birds, after the accuſtomed manner of other Gentiles, that doated vpon the augurations for things of future ſucceſſe.

Tacit. in deſcript. Germ.

(10) For the generall gouernment of their Country they ordained twelue Noblemen choſen from among others, for their worthineſſe and ſufficiency: Theſe in the time of peace rode their ſeuerall circuits to ſee juſtice and good cuſtomes obſerued, and they often of courſe at appointed times met together, to conſult and giue order in publike affaires: but euer in time of warre one of theſe twelue was choſen to be King, and ſo to remaine ſo long onely as the warres laſted: and that being ended, his name and dignitie of King alſo ceaſed, becomming againe as before. And this cuſtome continued among them, vntill their warres with the Emperour Charles the Great; at which time Wittekind, one of the twelue aforeſaid, a Nobleman of Angria in Weſtphalia, bore ouer the reſt the name and authoritie of King; and he being afterward, by meanes of the ſaid Emperour, conuerted to the faith of Chriſt, had by him his mutable Title of King turned into the enduring ſtile & honour of Duke: and the eleuen others were in like manner by the ſaid Emperor aduanced to the honourable Titles of Earles and Lords, with eſtabliſhment for the continuall remaining of theſe Titles and Dignities vnto them and their heires. Of whoſe deſcents are ſince iſſued the greateſt Princes at this preſent in Germanie. But though they obſerued this ſaid forme of gouernement elſewhere, yet here in Britaine it was otherwiſe, as hereafter will appeare.

(11) And thus much out of my poore readings, I haue obſerued of the originall beginnings, the names, manners, and cuſtomes, of our ancient Progenitors, the worthy Saxons, without either amplifying or impayring their glory: who being of all the Germans ſo much deuoted to warre, as that their onely fame therein was many times ſufficient to daunt the enemy, were thought vpon by the downcaſt Britaines as the fitteſt to ſupport their ruined Eſtate; of whoſe Entrance, Conqueſts, and Kingdomes, wee are now next addreſſed to ſpeake.

CHAPTER IIII.

An. Do. 450

WHen the ſtate of Britaine was miſerably torne by the calamities of ciuill Diſſenſions, Famine, death, and Robberies; the Romans returned, their owne Strength decayed, and their Afflictions daily augmented by their wonted enemies the Scots and Picts; no hope was left to their deſpayring hearts, that of themſelues they were able to defend themſelues: and therefore (as we haue ſhewed) they called to their ayd the Saxons, a Nation fierce and valorous, who to the number of nine thouſand, vnder the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, two brethren, entred Britaine at Ebsfleet in the Ile of Thanet, in the raigne of Theodoſius the ſecond, and of Valentinian the third, Emperors of the Eaſt and Weſt, about the yeere of Grace 450. Receiued they were with great joy as Angels from Heauen, and ſaluted with ſongs after the accuſtomed manner of the Britaines, who appointed them the Iland Thanet for their habitation.

(2) Theſe Saxons in ſhort time made proofe of their Manhood. For ouercomming the Enemy euen in Scotland it ſelfe, ſeated themſelues in ſome part thereof; ſo that their Conqueſt ſeemed abſolute, and the Britaines freed from their former aſſaults. Peace thus ſetled, and the Inhabitants freed, a friendly Compoſition was made betwixt theſe Nations, wherein the Saxons vndertooke to maintaine the Field, and the Britaines to ſuſtaine the Charge. In which league they abode ſome certaine time, ſaith Witichindus, making vſe in a ciuill ſort of the Brets friendſhip: but ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Country large, the ſoyle fertile, and the hands of the Inhabitants ſlow to practiſe feates of Armes: and further conſidering with themſelues, that themſelues and the greateſt part of the Saxons had no certain place of abode, they found fault with their pay & want of victuals, making that their quarrell, as both too meane, and too little for their high deſerts: threatning withall as vnkinde Gheſts, that ſhortly they would reckon without their Hoſts: and thereupon ſending ouer for more of their Nation, entred eace with the Scots and Picts, who all together roſe againſt the poore Brets.*

Marke 10. Vortigern would needs haue Rowna to wife. Will. Malmesb. de Regibus.

(5) Hengist and Horsa in their Language, as also in the ancient Teutonic Tongue, doe both of them signifie a Horse, vnto which beast the Saxons had great regard, and whose neighings (saith Tacitus) were their presages, and being white, were imployed in their sacrilegious ceremonies. Virgil also maketh the Horse to be a luckie Osse or foretokened successe in Battle, as in this his Verse he doth intimate and write:

And Crantzius tels vs, that it was a vsuall thing, with the Pagan Germans, especially of their Noble-men, to take the names of Beasts, some from the Lyon, some from the Beare, some from the Wolfe, and some from the Horse, as here Hengist and Horsa are said to signifie.

Moreouer, Charles Emmanuel the now Duke of Sauoy, who is lineally descended from the ancient Princes of the chiefe house of Saxony, by Prince Beral, who came out of Saxony into Sauoy in the yeere of our Lord 998. & was the third son of Hugh Duke of Saxony, which Hugh was brother vnto the Emperour Otho the Third, doth yet beare for one of his Coats the said Leaping Horse.

(7) This Hengist was doubtlesse a Prince of the chiefest bloud and Nobilitie of the Saxons, and by birth of Angria in Westphalia, wherein vnto this day a place retaineth the name of Hengster-holt. He with his brother were the sonnes of one Wihtgisil, whose father was Witta, and his father Vecta the eldest sonne of Woden, as Beda writes him, of whose issue many Kings of sundry Prouinces (saith he) had their originall.

He growne now into high fauour with ths King, by the mariage of Rowena, and feared of the Nobilitie for his strength & policie, bare himselfe great among all, and his supplies daily arriuing, pestred (if not plagued) most parts of this Iland. For saith Ninius and Beda; The riches of Britaine, and the fertilitie of the soyle, were such motiues to their conetous & aspiring mindes, that where they got footing, there they kept standing, and picked occasions where they were too strong. Amõg them that were sent for, by the aduice of Hengist, two principal captaines, Octa & Ebissa were chiefest, who being embarked in forty Pinnaces, sailed about the Picts Coasts, wasting the Iles that were called the Orcades, and got many Countries from them beyond the Frith, whereby a further terrour was stricken into the Britaines hearts.

But he ſtill continuing in his laſciuious and careleſſe idleneſſe, was laſtly taught by wofull experience, what miſery wilfull raſhneſſe and neglected gouernment doe bring: for the Britaines his ſubiects no longer would be thus abuſed, to ſee themſelues wouen into greater danger by ſhew of defence, then they formerly had beene by the hoſtilitie of the enemy; but forthwith diſclaimed their obedience to the King, when he had raigned the ſpace of ſix yeeres, and choſe for their Gouernour his ſonne young Vortimer.

(9) His Sonne he was indeed by nature, but not his in conditions, who (beſides the quarrell of his Queene-mother for Rowenas ſake, reiected) bare an inward loue to his natiue Country, and an outward hate to the ſtrangers that daily ſought the ſubuerſion thereof, and preſently encountred with them in a pitched Battle neere vnto Ailsford in Kent, wherin Catigern and Horſa, brethren to Vortimer and Hengiſt, in ſingle fight hand to hand ſlew each other.

The credit whereof is continued to this day, where the Village Horſted is reported to haue receiued that name from him, which ſtandeth in the very ſame place where that Battle was fought, as the Inhabitants report.

(10) Three other Battles after this with variable ſucceſſe were fought betwixt the Britaines and the Saxons, one at Craford, another at Weppeds-fleet, and the third vpon Colmore: in which laſt the Britaines bare themſelues ſo valiantly, that the Saxons were driuen into the Iſle of Tanet (if not ouer the Seas) ſo that ſmall hope reſted for them ſo long as this valiant Vortimer liued, who had diſpoſſeſſed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often aſſailed them in Tanets as Fabian ſaith. After this Victory long he liued not, but was made away by poiſon through the meanes of Rowena the mother of all this miſchiefe, when he had ſate King the ſpace of foure yeeres: and the Father againe reeſtabliſhed.

(11) Vortigern now was no ſooner reſtored, but that Hengiſt had notice thereof, who was then in building a Caſtle at Leiden in Holland, as their Annales witneſſe, and Iohn Douſa in his verſes ſpecifie: where leauing all (as it were) at randome, he returned to follow his fortunes further in Britaine, and with a mightie Armie of his Saxons thought to land without impeachment: but the Britaines growne bold by their former Victories, and their bloud not cooled ſince it was heat in fight, admoniſhed their reeſtabliſhed King, who with them went to withſtand his arriuage. When Hengiſt therefore perceiued their courage, and knew their hatreds to him and his Saxõs, he ſought by ſmooth words to gaine the ſhoare; and by ſome ſtratageme, his wiſhed deſire: therefore pretending onely to viſit his daughter, yea and to rid the Land of her, if ſo he might haue leaue of the King and them; and therefore deſired a conference in friendly manner: after which, his Saxons ſhould depart the Land, and reſt the like friends to the Britaines, as they were when firſt they came in.

(12) This motion ſeemed reaſonable to the Nobilitie, and the place and time appointed, which was the firſt of May, and vpon the Plaine of Ambri, now called Salisbury: whither vpon equall termes (as was thought) each partie repaired, and a while conferred with friendly ſemblances; but in the end the Saxons vrging their wrongs, fel frõ words vnto blowes, the watch-word firſt giuen by Hengiſt their leader. The Britaines meant ſimply, and wore no weapons, according to Couenants: but the Saxons vnder their long Caſſocks had ſhort Skeines hid, with which, no ſooner the words, Nem eowr Seaxes,

The King they tooke prisoner; for whose ransome, the Countries of Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Norfolke, were deliuered vnto these Infidels, who shortly defiled the beautie of Christianitie with their Paganisme & heathenish cruelties. Then (saith Beda) the fire of Gods vengeance was kindled by these wicked Conquerours, and raged first vpon those Countries next adioyning, and afterwards from the East Sea vnto the West, without resistance made to quench the same; publike and priuate houses were ouerthrowne and layed leuell with the ground, Priests were slaine standing at the Altars, & Bishops with their flockes were murthered; neither was there any to bury the dead. And these are the times whereof we spake, and wherein the miserable Britaines abandoned the Land, or hid themselues in caues, wherein they either perished for hunger, or redeemed their liues with perpetuall slauery.

(13) Neither were their calamities greater in outward afflictions then their soules, polluted with the heresie of the Pelagians, brought by Agricola the sonne of Seuerianus a Pelagian Bishop, that did foulely corrupt the faith of the Britaines: to redresse which, Germanus Altisiodorensis, and Lupus Bishop of Trecassa in France, were by the brethren desired, and sent vnto their thus troubled and declining estate. These pillars of Gods truth, after they had powred forth prayers, and conuicted the Heretikes, ledde an Army of Britaines against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victory; after which (like vnto people that drew on Gods vengeance and their owne destructions) they fell to robberies & rapine, one Citie banding against another, and all laid waste by the Saxons and themselues. These miseries doth Gildas impute to haue hapned to his Britaines, because they took no care to preach the Gospell of Christ vnto those Infidels the English Saxons, that in their heathenish cruelties sought the Lands destruction.

(14) Vortigern thus dispossessed, for his further securitie betooke himselfe into Wales, where among those vast Mountaines he built a strong Castle; of whose foundatiō, Merlin the Welsh Wizard, with the future successe that should afterward follow the Britaines, hath by way of prophecie vainly spoken. This Castle most of our Writers haue said to be in South-Wales, vpon a rockie and solitarie Mountaine called Breigh, or after others Cloaric, in the West of that Prouince, not farre from Radnor, and neere vnto the Riuer Gnaua: but the Inhabitants of North-wales report (by the reports of their ancestors) that in old Bethkelert was that Castle, which Vortigern built, and is yet called Embris, frō Merlin Embris, as they affirm. And surely (besides the craggie and solitarinesse of the place, which seemed to me rather an entrance into the shadow of death, then to be the Palace or Court of a King) the Riuer Llynterreny mooueth much; by which Faustus his sonne, begotten of his owne daughter Rowena, is said to spend his life in continuall prayers.

(15) But whilest Vortigern was busied in building this Castle, and the Saxons making spoiles whersoeuer they came, the Britaines vnder the conduct of Aurelius Ambrosius, beganne to receiue some breath of hopes, and to shew themselues out of their Caues. This Ambrosius (saith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which onely of all the bloud of the Romans remained then aliue, his parents being slaine, which had borne the name of the King of the Country. He with his brother Vter, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britaine Armorica, where they had remained from the Tyranny of Vortigerne, landed at Totnesse in the West of this Iland; vnto whom resorted great Troopes of Britaines.

His first Expedition was against Vortigern the scourge of his Country, and murtherer of his King: whose Castle straightwaies he besieged, and by the just reuenging hand of God, wilde fire consumed; wherein those adulterous and incestuous persons were burned to ashes.

(16) Next, following the common enemy, he gaue battle to the Saxons on the North of Humber at a place called Maesbell, wherein Hengist was discomfited, and in flight taken by Earle Eldoll of Gloceſter, and beheaded at Conningsborow, saith he of Monmouth. Howbeit, Matthew of Westminster maketh him fight another Battle vpon the Riuer Dun, in An. 489. wherein, saith he, Hengist was taken. And Polydore saith, that in the same Battle Hengist at the first onset was slaine, with many of his Germans: the fame of whose Victory (saith he) is had in memory with the Inhabitants of those parts euen vnto this day.

Yet

Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers of those ancient times, and two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Hengist, neither this great victory of the Britaines. And Marianus the Scotish Monke seemeth to affirme the contrarie, where hee saith, that Hengist raigned thirtie foure yeeres in great glory; and dyed peaceably, leauing his sonne Eske to succeed him in the Kingdome of Kent. With whom also Florentius the Monke of Worcester agreeth. Howsoeuer, sure it is, had not the diuine power of God otherwise determined, the waining estate of Britaine doubtlesse had recouered her former strength; both by the prayers of Bishop German, the prowesse of this last spoken of Ambrosius, the valorous attempts of Vter Pendragon, and the worthy industries of the Christian King Arthur. The famous resistances of this last mentioned Arthur, the Monke of Monmouth with such fables hath augmented; that his Acts and Trauels may be compared to those of Hercules, or with the Conquests of Cæsar himselfe; insomuch that he hath been accounted and ranged in the catalogue of the Worlds nine Worthies. And surely (by the testimony of Malmesbury) he was a Prince of great worth, and did often aduenture with his small power to meete the Saxons in the face and in Field.

But the Britaines strength daily decreasing, and new supplies of these Saxons daily arriuing, brought the one in despaire to enioy their owne right, and the other to triumph in their intrusions of wrongs. For continually incroaching forward, and inlarging their limits whersoeuer they came, droue the Inhabitants before them from their wonted possessions, & seated themselues in the southerne & best part of the Land, laying the stones (as it were) of those foundations, whereupon in short time they raised their most glorious buildings.

(17) For euery seuerall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherein he first entred or made conquest of, with full resolution determined to keepe what he had got, and (as an absolute King) commãded his Prouince, whereby the Land became burdened with seuen of them at the first: as Hengist of Kent; Ella, of those parts now called Sussex and Surrey; Cherdik of the West; Erchenwin of the East; Ida of the North; Crida of the Middle land: and Vffa the parts now Middlesex and Essex: which Kingdomes thus begunne and erected, stood not long vnshaken by ciuill dissensions amongst themselues, each King enuying his equals greatnesse, and seeking to inlarge his own Dominions vpon the next. In which Combustions, few or none of them came to the graue in due time, but were either slaine in warres, or treacherously murdered in peace, or else inforced to sheare himselfe a Monke, and resigne his Crowne to another. To speake of all these together, I hold would bring too great a confusion to our History, and needlesse surcharge to the Readers memory: To auoid which, I will briefly set downe the Conquests, Circuits, Acts, and Descents, that in euery seuerall Kingdome happened while they stood in their Heptarchie, before they were vnited to an absolute Monarchie; and then (according to my prefixed purpose) continue the succession of GREAT BRITAINES Monarches.

The Saxons often at dissention among themselues.

(18) For albeit the Land was diuided into 7. seuerall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a soueraigne command within his owne limits; yet one of them euer seemed to be supreme of the rest; and that Prince who had the greatest power or successe in his warres, was euer accounted & called The King of the Englishmen, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his second Booke, and History of England, euer termeth them.

The mightiest of the Saxon Kings alwaies King of the English-men.

(19) Such therefore as held the rest vnder, either by Armes or alliance, in amity or subiection, swayed the whole Monarchy, and were acknowledged as Supremes in power ouer the rest; which succeeded not euer in the same Family, neither continued in one and the same Kingdome without reuersement, but were carried vpon the Flouds and Ebbes of variable successe, or as destiny pleased to alter the chance: whereof each of them (sauing the East-Saxons onely) did attaine to the height of that gouernment, as to the hauen of their wished desires. See therefore (if you please) a generall view of ỹ whole, and afterwards the seuerall Histories of euery Kingdome apart, before wee enter into the Succession of the English-Saxons Monarches.

THE GENEALOGIES ROYALL OF THE SAXONS KINGS OF KENT, FROM HENGIST, their first: with the Successions, Raignes, Issues, and Acts, of all their Kings, vnto Baldred the last: subdued by King Egbert the West-Saxon Monarch.

FRom Hengist the first Conquerour, and Ethelbert the first Christian King, the Kingdome of Kent hath preheminēce aboue the rest of that Heptarchie. For, Hengist for valour, policie, and strength, was the fore-leader of those that laid their Estates here in Great Britaines Island, and with such happie successe, so planted the Tree, as from the same Stemme, many fayre Sciens daily yet spring. And good Ethelbert laid the foundation of Gods Church, so deepe in this Realme, as the gates of hell ſhall neuer preuaile againſt it, though his owne foundations laid of his firſt Church, hath felt the waight of a ruinating hand; when with Axes and Hammers (in the dayes of King Henry the eight) both that, and many ſuch Sanctuaries, were broken and beaten downe, with a more raſh, then godly zeale; and thoſe Oratories for aſſemblies, made now the ſeates of prophane merchandizing, and Altars of prayers, the Tables for Mammon, and money changers; if not to more vile and baſe vſes. But leauing to mention what may not be remedied; behold in this Tree, the boughes that branched from HENGIST the Roote, wherein obſerue, Their matches or marriages are made knowne by the ſculpture of an hand in hand, and the Coat-armes of the parties empaled; though therein wee rather follow the allowance of the later, then vrge them from Antiquitie it ſelfe. But from the beſt approued Authors wee continue ſuch Kings as ruled in Kent, in a continued Succeſſion; and that broken off, wee there breake the Bough, and thence name them for Kings, but of an vncertaine ſucceſſion, as by the three laſt in this ſtemme, is euidently ſeene.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT.

CHAPTER I.

1. An. D. 455. Kent in the dayes of Iulius Cæsar the Seat of foure Kings.

KENT, the first Dominion of the Saxons Heptarchy, was formerly in the dayes of Iulius Cæsar, the Seate of foure seuerall petty Kings, yet neuer called a Kingdome, before that Hengist, the first Saxon Captaine, in fauour of his daughter Rowena, got it by gift of King Vortigern, about the yeare of grace 455. and in the seuenth yeare after his first arriuage here; he first laid the foundation of those fortunes which the Saxons his Nation in this Land afterwards attained vnto: for hauing possessed the same with Victory and Wealth, the space of thirty one yeares, (some adde three more) he left it in peace to his sonne Eske, and the rest of the Iland so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lieth betwixt our East-Ocean and the Riuer Thames, being bounded vpon the West with Sussex and Surrey.

2. An. D. 488. Petrus Alphonsus, Eske the second King of Kent.

ESke, the second King of Kent, is reported to be the second son of King Hengist, who accompanying his Father into this Iland, made proofe of his great valour in all his Battles fought against the Britaines, and in one of them (as Geffrey of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Yorke, but thence escaping, he ayded his Father in the Battle of Crekynford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, from whom those Inhabitants (saith Beda) were called Eskings amongst whom he peaceably raigned about twenty yeares, and died in the yeare of our Lord 512.

Retained prisoner in York.

OCta the sonne of Eske, beganne his raigne ouer his fathers Dominions, the yeare of Christs Incarnation 512. and raigned twenty two yeres, without mention of any memorable Act.

4. An. D. 532. Flor. Wigorn. Imerick the son of Eske. Imerick his children.

IMerick, the son of Eske, and the fourth King of Kent, raigned twentie-fiue yeares, saith Stowe; twenty nine, saith Sanile, in his Table collected from our English Writers. He had issue, Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Rikell, married to Sledda the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Sebert and Segebald.

5. An. D. 561. Ethelbert the sonne of Imerick.

EThelbert, the son of Imerick, in the yere of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, who by reason of his yong yeres, was sore molested by his neighbor Princes, that sought to inlarge their Prouinces vpon his: for now the Saxons hauing made full Conquest of the Britaines, fell at variance among themselues, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerours commonly can endure no equals, and prosperity euer is looked at with an enuious eye; whereupon Cheulin King of the West-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes ouer the Britaines, began to disdain all amity with his owne neighbour Saxons, inuaded the Territories of this young Prince, and in a set battle slew Oslaue and Cnebban, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and won the day. This field was fought at wiphandun, in the yeare of our Redemption 567. and is noted to be the first battle betwixt the Saxons themselues since their first entrance into Britaine.

Cheulin inuadeth his Territories.

largement of his Kingdome to the bankes of Humber, and was the fift Monarch of the Engliſh-men, as after wee ſhall heare. His firſt Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik, King of France, by whom he had Edbald, Ethelburg, and Edburg: a ſecond wife he had vnworthy of name, for her inceſtuous and abominable act, in matching her ſelfe in marriage with her Husbands Sonne, A ſinne (ſaith the Apoſtle) not to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as alſo of all the reſt that attained vnto the glory, to be enſtiled (per excellentiam) the Soueraigne Kings of the Engliſh-men, I purpoſe to be ſparing in their particular Kingdomes, & to reſerue the larger relatiō of their Acts, Matches, Iſſues, and Continuance, to the times of their ſeuerall Monarchies, whereby a more hiſtoricall courſe may be carried, through the ſucceſſions of the Engliſh-Saxon Monarches, and a needleſſe repetition of the ſame things auoyded, which otherwiſe of neceſſitie would follow. He raigned in great glory fiftie ſixe yeares, and was the Firſt Saxon King that receiued and eſtabliſhed the Goſpell. He died the foure and twentieth day of February, the yeare of Chriſt 616. after he had raigned 56. yeares, and was buried at Canterburie, with this inſcription vpon his Tombe:

EDbald, the ſonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeere of Chriſt 617. aſſumed the Gouernment of Kent, who no ſooner, ſaith Beda, had gotten from vnder the awe of his Father, but hee refuſed to entertaine the Doctrine of Chriſt, and ſo polluted himſelfe with the foule ſinne of fornication, as that hee married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father: which two hainous faults gaue his Subjects both occaſion and impunitie to returne to their former idolatry, who vnder his Father, for fauour, or for feare, had yeelded to the Lawes of the Chriſtian Faith. But the ſcourge of God and vengeance from Heauen wanted not to the puniſhment of this vnfaithfull King: for he was plagued for a ſeaſon with often phrenſie of minde, and raging fury of an vncleane Spirit; but by Laurence Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, he was at length conuerted from his Idolatry and inceſtuous Matrimony, and being baptized, indeuoured to maintaine the ſtate

He married Emme, the daughter of Theodebert, King of Auſtraſie, now Lorrayne, by whom he had iſſue a Daughter named Enſwith, who died a Virgin at Fulkeſtone, a Religious Houſe in Kent of her Fathers foundation; and two Sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his Father, and left iſſue Dompnena, who was married to a Mercian Prince; Ermenberg that died a vailed Virgin, Ermengith a mention; Ethelred and Ethelbert, both murthered by their Coſin-german, King Egbert. His younger Sonne was Ercombert that ſucceeded him in the Kingdome. This Edbald built a Chappell within the Monaſtery of Saint Peter and Paul at Canterbury, in honour of Mary the bleſſed Mother of God, endowing that Church with ſufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twenty foure yeares raigne, he was buried neere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

ERcombert, the Son of Edbald by Emme his Wife, ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdome of Kent, in the yeare of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Chriſtian King: for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he ſuppreſſed, & commanded the faſt of Lent to be obſerued. His Wife was Sexburg, the daughter of Anna King of the Eaſt-Angles, by whom he had iſſue Egbert and Lothair, both Kings of Kent after him; Ermenhild, Wife to Wolfere King of Mercia, and Erkengode a profeſſed Nunne in the Monaſtery of Saint Brigets in France, where ſhe died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his dayes the ſtate of the Church growing to a well-ſetled forme of Gouernment, the Prouince of Kent was diuided into Pariſhes by Honorius the Archbiſhop, as teſtifie the Records of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury. This King hauing raigned twenty foure yeares and odde moneths, died in the yeare of our Lord 664.

EGbert, the elder Sonne of King Ercombert, in the nonage of his young Nephewes, Ethelred and Ethelbert, (the ſons of his Vncle Ermenred) obtained the rule of Kent; and had not their murther much blemiſhed his peaceable Gouernment, hee might well haue held place with the worthieſt of thoſe Kings: but thirſting after an abſolute Soueraigntie, and fearing leaſt his owne power ſhould diminiſh by their growths and rightfull ſuc-

But God (ſaith Malmesbury) that ſearcheth the heart, reuealed the act by caſting vp their bodies on the ſhore, to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reuerence there buried them, and built a ſmall Chappell ouer their Monument, whoſe bones afterwards were remoued, and new interred in the Abbey of Ramſey in Hantſhire. The Lady Dompnena their Siſter, & next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of Weſt-Mercia, and borne him foure Children, founded the Abbey of Minſter in Kent: Wherein, ſaith Stowe, ſhee became the firſt Abbeſſe her ſelfe, and Mildrith her daughter ſucceeded her therein, ſaith Capgraue. This King in great quietneſſe raigned nine yeares, & died in the yeare of grace 673. in the moneth of Inly: leauing iſſue Edrik and Wigtred, both Kings of Kent, ſucceeding after Lothaire.

9. An. D. 673. Lothaire intrudeth into the Kingdome.

Lothaire the brother of Egbert, by ſtrõg hand obtained the Gouernment of Kent. For notwithſtanding Egbert left iſſue Edrik and Wigtred, (as is ſaid) yet Lothaire taking the aduantage of their minorities, and the example of his brothers intruſions, made himſelfe King againſt his, as he had done againſt the Sonnes of Ermenbert, but did not enioy the ſame with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred ſtrongly againſt him, but alſo Edrik, by the aſſiſtance of the South-Saxons continually ſought to recouer his right, whereby the peace of the Kentiſh was much moleſted: and laſtly, in a bloudy battle was Lothaire ſhot thorow with a dart, whereof he died vnder his Chirurgeons hand, the ſixth day of February, in the yeare of Chriſt 685. after hee had raigned eleuen yeares & ſeuen moneths. The puniſhment of the Murther committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaid, ſaith Malmesbury, who derided and made jeſts at the laments for young Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. To meet theſe, the Kentiſh aſſembled, and getting the aduantage, burned Mollo to death: in whoſe reuenge Ceadwalla perſiſted, and waſted the moſt part of the Prouince before he departed: ſo that after for ſixe yeares continuance no King raigned in Kent, but the Country lay expoſed to the tyrannies of oppreſſors.

He entred his Kingdome the yeare of mans Redemption 693. the eleuenth of November, and two hundred and fiue yeares, after the death of Hengiſt the firſt Saxon. With him raigned one Swebharde, as Beda declareth: but without mention from whom, or vpon what occaſion. He founded the Priorie of S. Martin at Douer, and behaued himſelfe worthily both in War and Peace: his raigne was thirty yeares; thirty-three, ſaith Beda; and death in Anno 725. leauing iſſue Edbert, Ethelbert, and Alrick, all three ſucceeding ſucceſſiuely in the Kingdome.

14. Alrik the last of lineall succession.

Alrick, the third Sonne of King Withred, by the death of his Brother Ethelbert, obtained the Kingdome of Kent, the yeare of Christs Incarnation 760. no other glory attending his affaires (saith Malmesbury) besides his vnfortunate fight at Otteford against Offa King of the Mercians, wherein it seemed some honour (though with his ouerthrow) to withstand so puissant and impugnable an enemy. He is the last King of Kent that held the scepter in a lineall succession: the rest that followed, both got and enioyed it by tyranny and vsurpation. This King is said to raigne thirty-foure yeares, and to die in the yeere of grace, seuen hundred ninety three.

All the Kings of Kent after Alrick vsurpers.

15. An. D. 794.

Ethelbert, surnamed Pren, vsurped the Title and Authoritie ouer the Kentish Dominions, when that Prouince was sore oppressed with the inuasion of the Mercian Kenulfe, whose warres against Kent, by succession from Offa, were continued with such rigour and valour, that the Country lay desolate where he had bin, and the people distressed whither hee came. This Pren, Kenulfe tooke prisoner, and led away with him into Mercia: but at the dedicatiō of a Church that he had then founded at Winchcombe, in presence of ten Dukes and thirteene Bishops, he released him at the High Altar, without either intreatie or ransome of redemption. The King returning againe into Kent, could not there be receiued; his place either being supplied by another, or himselfe so disliked, as not worthy any longer to raigne: and hauing had experience of the worlds mutabilities, is left againe to his priuate fortunes, from whence he had stepped, hauing held his estate but for three yeares continuance.

His imprisonment.

His releasement.

Cuthred, saith Malmesbury, was made King of Kent by Kenulfe King of Mercia, when he had ouercome and captiuated Ethelbert: notwithstanding hee is accounted for an Vsurper, and bare the title of King the tearme of eight yeares, without any other act worthy of remembrance, inheriting his predecessors euill hap and calamitie, through factions and ciuill discords.

An. D. 797.

Baldred, after the death of this Cuthred, tooke vpon him the princely dignitie of Kent, about the yeare of Christs Natiuitie 805. But now the heauenly prouidence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had diuided, raised from exile little Egbert, to make him the Great Monarch of the Englishmen. His first warres were against Bernulfe King of Mercia, and his second against this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in battle he vanquished, and forced him out of his Kingdome, after he had sate on that Princely Throne the space of eighteene yeares. This Baldred is said to haue fled ouer Thames, and to leaue Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he neuer returned, neither yet was heard of after his ouerthrow. This Kingdome then that was erected by Hengist, the yeare of mans happinesse 455. continued her gouernment 372. and ended her glory in the yeare 827. being made a Prouince vnto the West-Saxons.

THis Kingdome of the South-Saxons, though it began with the firſt, in the ſecond yeere after the entrance of Hengiſt: and that Ella their firſt King, was the ſecond Monarch that ſwayed the Scepter of the Saxons Monarchy in Great Britaine: yet after Ella his death, it was the moſt obſcure of all the reſt, had the feweſt Kings, and the ſhorteſt time of their Kingdomes continuance: In ſo much as William Monke of Malmesbury, hath not ranked their Kings among the other Saxons, nor any other Writer recorded aboue three Kings, without further ſucceſſion or other collaterals: and the two laſt that gouerned, are rather called Captaines then Kings. As therefore wee finde them recorded by Florentius Monke of Worceſter, wee haue inſerted their Succeſſions here as thou ſeeſt, and will relate their Acts from others in this following Diſcourſe.

THe Kingdome of the South-Saxons, containing the Counties of Sussex and Surrey, had on the East side Kent; on South, the Sea and Ile of Wight; vpon the West, Hant-shire, and the North-side inuerged with the Riuer Thames: this Kingdome was erected by Ella a Saxon Captaine, that in the second yeare of Hengists entrance, as some say, brought a supply of his Saxons into Britaine, with whom came his three sonnes, Kymen, Plenching, and Cissa: these landing at a place (which from Kymen was afterwards) called Kymen-shore, discomfited the Inhabitants, that made resistance, and Ella himselfe King of those Southern parts. But doubtlesse there are many opiniõs of this mans first entrance and new erected estate: for some (as Sir Henry Sanile in his Table) set it in the second yeare of Hengists first arriuall, Anno foure hundred fifty two. Others in the second of Aurelius, and no lesse then thirty yeares after that, Anno foure hundred eighty two. Harrison will haue it forty three yeares after the Saxons first entrance, and fourth yeare after King Hengist his death, Anno foure hundred ninety two. And M. Ferrers in his Succession of the English Monarches, placeth it in the three and twentieth yeere of K. Hengists Kingdome, and in the fifth after his own arriual, the yeere of our redemption 488. Of such vncertainty is ỹ beginning of this South-Saxons Kingdome, whose Continuance and Successions are nothing cleerer; insomuch that Malmesbury making seuerall chapters vpon the other six, omitteth onely this of the South-Saxons: and therefore as we find them, let vs haue leaue to relate them, and for the present to leaue Ella as he was King, till we come to a fit place where more shall be spoken of him as he was Monarch; whose raigne is set by Stow to be 36. yeares; by Sir Henry Sauile 24. and by M. Henry Ferrers 32. and to haue died in the yeare fiue hundred and fourteene.

And the History of Saint Swithune saith, it was done by Saint Berinus, Bishop of Dorchester, who vsually preaching the Gospell in the Kingdome of the Mercians, in the Citie of Oxenford, and presence of Wulpherus King of Mercia, it hapned that King Athelwold, then a Pagan, was present, who by the indeuour of Wulpherus, and instruction of Berinus, receiued the Lauer of Baptisme, whom also Wulpherus receiued at the Font for his God-sonne, and in signe of that Adoption gaue vnto him two Prouinces, to be annexed to his former Kingdome, that is to say, the Ile of Wight, and the Prouince of Manures in the West of England; at which time also Berinus by King Athelwolds permission, baptized the chiefe Dukes and Nobles of that Prouince. His Queene Ebba was baptized in her owne Ile, the Prouince of the Viccians, being the daughter of Eanfride, who was brother to Eanheres, and both of them Christians. THE KINGDOME OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, THE CIRCVIT THEREOF, AND SVCCESSION OF THEIR KINGS VNTO EGBERT, WITH THEIR ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER VII.

THE West-Saxons Kingdome, containing the West of the Iland, vnto the Lizards poynt, and lands end in Cornwall, was first erected by Cherdik a valiant captaine, that led his Saxons in the conquest of that Prouince: and euer bare as hard an hand ouer the ouerborne Britains, as did any of those intruders, that had seated themselues in other mens rights. Three of whose Kings so caried th'eselues among the other Saxons, as they by amity, or awe, loue, or constraint ſtraint, won, and wore the Emperiall crowne of the whole; till by the death of the one brother, and youth of the other, Kent againe got it, & others from them, till Egbert the ſeuenteenth King of this kingdom ioyned all into one. The ſtem of the whole, from Cherdik to Egbert, is here branched, whoſe ſap of growth from them in many of our Engliſh honorable families, hath fairely budded euen vnto this day: and I pray may ſo bud for euer; that the Land may be bleſſed in our Kings the ſonnes of theſe Nobles, and happy in our Princes, that eat for ſtrength and not for appetite, Eccle. 10.17. Many of theſe Weſt-Saxons firſt conuerts, may bee liuing examples to their following poſterities, in ſhewing their faiths by their workes, and in building of Oratories for Gods diuine ſeruice, as K. Ine did Glaſtenbury, King Kenwulfe S. Andrewes in Welles, and King Eadwallo in an holy zeale layd by his robes, and tooke the habit of a Monke in Rome. The Queens likewiſe of this Kingdome, in the like deuoted zeale ſought to forward the ſtate of Chriſtianity; for to that end did Queene Seburge build the Nunnery of Shepey, and vailed herſelf a Nunne therein; Queene Ethelburg layd by her royall robes, and tooke the vaile and charge of Abbeſſe of Barking. And Queene Cuthburg too zealous that way, forſooke the bed of her King and huſband, to liue more chaſte, as then was taught; but contrary to the command of the Apoſtle, who forbad to defraud the duty of marriage, 1 Corinth. 7. 3. and commendeth that bed to be honourable and vndefiled, Heb. 13.4. The West-Saxons the first that brought the Heptarchy to a Monarchy

THe kingdome of the West-Saxons, though in time later then the two former; yet in circuit and fame surmounted them both; whose Monarch was the Maull that first brake the Scepter of the other six kingdomes in sunder, and made one Crowne of these their seueral Diademes, more glorious then they all, and that first worne vpon Egbert the VVest-Saxons head, and the Scepter swayed in his Imperiall hand; vntill whose time and person wee will continue the succession of their Kings, beginning with Cherdik that first made it a Kingdome, and briefly shew their acts whilest it so stood in the Saxons Heptarchy.

Florens. Wigor.

1. An. D. 495. The time when Cherdik entred into Britaine.

THis Cherdik is sayd to haue brought a second supply of Saxons forces into Britaine, in the yeere of our Lord 495. and fifth of King Ella, and seuenth of the Monarchie of great Hengist, his landing being at a place vpon that occasion called Cherdik-shore; who with his sonne Kenrike, was encountred by the Britaines, vnder the conduct of Natanleod a British Prince (whose Country was then called after his name) whom hee slew in Battle, with fiue thousand of his Britaines: the fortune of which field gaue resolutions and hopes of better successe: it was fought neere vnto a Brooke vpon that euent called Cherdikesford, now by contraction Chard-ford. Hereupon establishing his new erected kingdome, (which contained Cornwall, Deuonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hantshire, and Barkeshire,) hee inlarged the same with the conquest of the Ile of Wight, the gouernement whereof was by him giuen to Stuffe and Withgar his Nephewes; which latter slew the Britains there inhabiting, and named the place of his victory Withgarbirg, assuming the name of King, and was buryed at his City Withgar, in the same Ile. About seuen yeeres after Cherdikes entrance, Porth a Saxon with his two Sonnes, Megla and Beda, landed in the West, at the place from him called Portsmouth, whose ayd with Kent and Sussex, assisted Cherdike in his Conquests. His raigne is set to be thirty three yeeres, and his death in the yeere of grace fiue hundred thirty fiue, hauing had two sonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolf, the one of which dyed before his Father; and the other succeeded him in his Kingdome. Chelwolf had issue Cuthgils, whose sonne was Kenfrid, and his sonne Kensy, the Father of king Kentwin, who was the Successor of king Kenwalke, & predecessor of king Kentwin, in the kingdome of the West-Saxons.

The circuit of this kingdom.

The first kings raigne, issue, and death.

KEnrik, the eldest Sonne of King Cherdike; hauing formerly made proofe of his prowesse in the assistance of his Father, was after his death also very fortunate in obtaining two victories ouer the Britaines; the one at Searesberige, and the other at Beranbrig; whose raigne beginning Anno 534. continued twenty six yeeres; ending in the yeere of our Redemption, fiue hundred sixty. Hee had issue three sonnes, of which Cheaulin the eldest succeeded him in his Kingdome; Cuthwolfe the second assisted his Brother in his Warres, and was partaker with him of his victories, who died Anno 672. leauing issue one onely Sonne, named Chell, or Cearlike, who proued nothing so vertuous and dutifull a subject as his father had beene: for he arose in rebellion against his Vncle, and by strong hand expelled him his Kingdome.

Cearlike the son of Cuthwolfe rebelleth against his Vncle.

The third Sonne of King Kenrike was Cuth, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe: for he had three sonnes, of which Chelwolfe the eldest, was King of the West-Saxons, (as shall be declared:) Chell the second, was father to Kingils the sixt (and first Christian King of the West-Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwall and Kenwin, the seuenth and ninth kings of that kingdome: and Ched the youngest, was father of Kenbert, Grandfather to Chedwall the most renowned King of the West-Saxons, of whom we are presently to speake, and of them all in the succession of the English Saxons Monarchs: and now to returne againe to the issue of King Kenrik.

Chedwall the most renowned King of the West-Saxons.

3. An. D. 519. Cheaulin the time when he began to raigne.

CHeaulin his first sonne, entred vpon the gouernment ouer the West-Saxons Anno 561. and euen at the first began to disturb the quiet peace of his neighbour Prouinces, taking aduantage at the young yeers of Ethelbert (who was made King of Kent in the same yere that Cheaulin, was made king of West Saxons) whom he discomfited, & slew his two Captains, Duke Oslane and Duke Cnebba, at Wibbandune, as wee haue sayd. Other Victories hee obtained ouer the Britaines, both at Bedford, Deorham, Gloceſter, Cirencester, & Bathanceſter. But the fortunes of warres being alwayes variable, at length his successe altered, and at Wannes ditch in Wiltshire

He had issue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former serued valiatly in the wars vnder his father at Wimbledon in Surrey, where king Ethelbert of Kent was chased, and his souldiers slaine: and with the like valour and victory hee fought at Fethanleygh against the Britaines, notwithstanding that therein he lost his life, the yeere of our Lord 585. and the fiue and twentieth of his fathers raigne. Cuthwin his younger brother suruiued his father, but succeeded not in his kingdome, being then (by reason of his young yeeres) vnable to recouer his right. He had two sons Kenbald and Cuth; the later of which was father to Chelwald, whose son Kenred had issue, Ine the eleuenth King of the West-Saxons, and Ingils his brother, whose sonne was Eoppa the father of Easa, whose son was Alkemund, the father of Egbert the eighteenth King of the West-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons diuided Heptarchie into an absolute Monarchie.

Chelwolfe the sonne of Cuth, the sonne of Kenrik, and Cosen-german to Cearlik the preceding king, began his raigne ouer the West-Saxons, the yeere 598. on whose first entrance, this prouince of the West-Saxons was inuaded both by the Britains, and also by the Scots and Picts: and the East-Angles likewise molested his peace vnder the conduct of Redwald at that time Monarch of the Englishmen. But hee wading thorow these troubles, harried the Prouince of the South-Saxons with inuasions and calamities, in the Prosecution whereof he died, leauing the pursuit of his warres and possessions of his Kingdome to Kingils his Nephew, that immediatly succeeded him, after he had raigned the space of fourteene yeeres.

Kingils the Sonne of Chel, who was brother to king Chelwolfe, succeeding his Vncle in the kingdome of the West-Saxons, in the yeere six hundred and twelue, in his third yeere hee associated vnto him in his Gouernment Quincheline his Sonne; who ioyntly managed the West-Saxons affaires both of warre and peace. And fighting with victory against the Britaines at Beandune, slew of them one thousand forty six persons; and after that against Penda King of Mercia. neere vnto Cirencester, about the fift yeere of his raigne, where lastly they came to a conclusion of peace. Hee raigned the space of thirty one yeeres, some say but twenty seuen, and had issue (besides Quinchelinus, who raigned with him, and dyed before him) Kenwin and Kenwald, that succeeded him; and Kineburg his daughter married to Oswald, as is sayd. Quinchelinus had a sonne named Cuthred, that was baptized with his Father at Dorchester, and is sayd by Stowe, to haue raigned after the death of Kingils: but I take it rather to bee Kenwen, whom some suppose to be his fathers Associate the terme of foure yeeres, but neuer sole King himselfe.

Kenwald receiueth the Christian faith.

Kenwald, whom Beda calleth Senwalch, succeeded his Father Kingils in the kingdome of the West-Saxons. His beginnings by Mathew Westminster are compared to be with the worst, and his endings with the best of those kings. At his first entrance he fought with victory against the Britaines at Pennum, whereof he became most insolent, and refused not onely to receiue the Christian Faith, but also put from him his lawfull wife Sexburg, the sister of Penda King of Mercia, whereby hee became hatefull to his owne Subiects, and sore assaulted by the Mercian King, who followed the reuenge so farre, that he forced Kenwald out of his kingdome; who being driuen to extremity sought succour at the mercy of Anna the Christian King of the East-

Hee founded the Cathedrall of Wincheſter, and the Abby of Malmesbury, and when hee had raigned thirty one yeeres, gaue place vnto nature in the yeere 673. leauing no issue of his body to succeede him: whereupon Segburg his wife tooke vpon her the gouernment of the West-Saxons, the same yeere that Lothair was made King of Kent, shee being a woman of great spirit and vnderstanding, and sufficiently worthy to haue managed the Kingdome, had shee not beene preuented by death, or rather (as some write) by a religious deuotion, that the affaires of this present life might not hinder her zealous meditations of the future: in desire whereof she abandoned her Regencie, and built a house of deuotion in the Ile of Shepey, wherein herselfe became a Vowesse, & afterward was elected the Abbesse of Elie.

He was the sonne of Kensy, the sonne of Kenfrid, the sonne of Cuthgils, the sonne of Chelwolfe, the sonne of Cherdik, the first King of that Prouince: his raigne lasted but two yeeres, in which time hee fought a great Battle with Wulfere King of the Mercians, at the place then called Bidanheaford, and wherein many of the Saxons on both sides perished, leauing neither issue to succeede him, nor other matters to be spoken of him, though (as it seemeth) he had dispossessed Kenwin, who had more right to the Crown then himselfe; or (as Beda and Malmesbury auerre) he raigned with him the space of two yeers, and Kenwin alone for seuen yeeres more.

He was a great scourge vnto the weake and ouer-borne Britaines, making Conquests of their possessions, and forcing them euen to the Sea-shoare, being a people allotted vnto misery, and by these strangers pursued so vehemently, that lastly they were driuen into the West-Angle of this Iland, and their liues defended and maintained among those waste Mountaines & hard rockes, which therin were more propitious and gentle then the stony hearts of their Oppressors.

Ceadwalla a valiant young man, and of the bloud Royall of the Gewisses, sayth Beda, being banished from his Country through the enuy of others, who maligned him only for his vertues, and worthinesse, succeeded Kenwin his kinsman in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons, and with greater glory raigned then any other in that Prouince before him had done. He was the sonne of Kenbert, whose father was Ched, the second Sonne of Cuth; and Cuth was the third Sonne of Kenrik, who was the eldest son of Cherdik, that laid the first stone of this kingdomes foundation. His first brunt of fury was against Edilwach, King of the South-Saxons, whom in field he slew: and in another battell Berthun, that had made himselfe King of that State. The Ile of Wight also he almost quite wasted: and though he were vnbaptized, yet did he binde himselfe by vow to giue the fourth part of the spoile vnto Gods vse, and performed it accordingly vnto Bishop Wilfrid, who with Bernwine and Hildila conuerted the people from their Idolatrous superstition, vnto the true seruice of Christ, it being the last part of the Saxons possessions that was turned from their Pagan manners. Of which his specious deuotion, Malmesbury giueth this censure: Although we praise his affection, (sayth he) yet allow wee not the example; for it is written, that who so offereth vnto God the goods of the poore, doth as it were sacrifice the son in the sight of the Father. Kent also with grieuous warres hee twice afflicted, and therein spilt so much Christian blood, that nature herselfe was therin offended, and hee at last as much lamented: in repentance whereof, after he had raigned in great stoutnes the space of two yeeres, in a zealous deuotion went to Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Easter Euen (sayth Beda, the yeere of our Redemption 689.) by the name of Peter, and wearing as yet the white Robes of innocency, put (as the rite then was) vpon him at his lauer of Baptisme, fell sicke, and the twentieth day of Aprill following dyed, hauing had neither wife nor child that we read of. In this time, ſaith Beda, the bodies of the dead were permitted to be buryed, within the walles of their Cities, which thing before was not lawfull, but their corps were interred without in the fields; many of whoſe Tombes are as yet witneſſes to vs, that daily find them in digging of the grounds adjoyning, and reſerue them for ſight or other neceſſary vſe.

The peace of this king was moleſted by his owne ſubiect, an Earle named Adelme, who boldly encountred his Soueraigne in Battle, and fought it out euen to the point of victory; but failing therof, and forced to flie, his life was pardoned. Sigebert obtaining the Principality of the Weſt-Saxõs, raigned therin no long time, & that without all honour or fame. His parentage is obſcure and vnknown, but his vices are made apparant and manifeſt; for hee wallowing in all ſenſuall pleaſures, added exactions and cruelties vpon his ſubiects, ſetting aſide all lawes and rules of true piety; of which vicious life, when he was louingly admoniſhed by his moſt faithfull Counſellor a worthy Earle called Cumbra, ſo far was his minde from abandoning his impious courſes, that he cauſed this Noble Perſonage to be cruelly ſlaine, whereupon the reſt of the Peeres ſeeing their State and liues were euery day in danger, and the commõ ſubiects, whoſe lawes were thus violated, being incenſed into furie, they rebelliouſly roſe vp in Armes againſt him, and would acknowledge him no longer their Soueraigne. Sigebert by nature as fearefull, as he was audacious vnto vice, fled into the woods as his only ſafeguard, wher like a forlorne perſon he wandred in the day, and in caues and dennes lodged in the night, till laſtly he was met with by a Swine-heard that was ſeruant to Cumbra, and of him known to be Sigebert, was preſently ſlaine in reuenge of his maſters death, in the wood that was then called Andreads Wald, when hee had raigned not fully two yeeres.

He founded the Cathedrall Church of S. Andrewes at Wels, which afterwards was an Episcopall See, and in great honour raigned for the space of twenty foure yeeres; but then Fortune turning her face away from him, the rest of his raigne did not sute to that which was spent: for hee giuing himselfe to pleasure and security, banished Kineard, the brother of his Predecessor Sigebert; who dissembling his wrong, gaue place vnto time, and occasion being offered, made his vse thereof. For Kenwulfe comming to Merton, to visit his Paramore, was there set vpon & slaine; and his body conueyed and buryed at Wincheſter, after hee had raigned twenty nine yeeres, leauing no memoriall either of Wife or Children.

Britbric, lineally descended from Cherdik the first King of the West-Saxons, a man of a soft and quiet disposition, succeeded Kenwulfe in that Principality, in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 784. He married Ethelburga, the daughter of great Offa the Mercian King, by whose power he expelled Egbert that ruled a Lordship in his Prouince vnder him, whose fame increasing through his feates of wars, draue many iealousies into King Brithrics head, and the more by the instigation of Ethelburga his Queene, who bearing her selfe great, because of her parentage, practised the downefall and destruction of them whom she hated, and by her suggestions, this Egbert was banished on suspition of conspiracy. It afterward chanced that shee preparing poyson to make an end of one of the Kings Minions, wrought thereby (though vnwittingly) the Kings death: for hee by tasting the confection ended his life, after hee had raigned the space of sixteene yeeres. Wherein, shee fearing the just reuenge of his subjects, fled into France, & by Charles then King, was so courteously entertained, as that for her great beauty there was offered her the choyce of him or his sonne. But shee in her youthfull and lustfull humour choosing the sonne, was debarred from both, and thrust into a Monastery, in the habit (not the affection of a a Nunne:) where not long after shee abused her body by committing of adultery, and was shortly expelled, and in beggerly misery ended her life, as by many that so saw her, we haue heard it reported, sayth Asserius mine Author. For this her most hainous crime, whereby was wrought the death of her Husband, the West-Saxons ordained a Law, to the great preiudice of all their Queenes succeeding; That none of them should haue either title, maiesty or place of royalty; which was seuerely executed for many yeeres after.

A Law against the Saxon Queenes.

In the dayes of this Brithric, many prodigies appeared, and more perhaps then will be beleeued. For it is reported, that in his third yeere a showre of blood rained from heauen, and bloody crosses fell vpon mens garments as they walked abroade. And in his tenth yeere were seene fiery Dragons flying in the ayre. Which wonders some tooke to bee presages of the miseries following, both by the Inuasions of the Pagan Danes, that in these times were first seene to arriue in this Iland, and the extreme Famine that afterwards happened: howsoeuer sure it is, that the Heptarchy now beganne to set, and the rising Monarchy to appeare in the West, by King Egbert, whose Acts and issue shall be further rehearsed, when wee shall come to the time of his succession among the English Monarches.

THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME, THE CIRCVIT, SVCCESSIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES AND KINGDOMES CONTINVANCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

THis Kingdome of the East-Saxons, though one of the least in circuit and power, yet in conuersion from Paganisme, and imbracing Christian Religion, were with the first: and out-went many others in their religious zeale. For Sebert King of this Kingdome, assisted by his vncle Ethelbert King of Kent (the first Christian King of all the Saxons) for the honor and seruice of God, built a Monastery in London dedicating it vnto his Apostle S. Paul: And another at Westminster, vnto his other Apostle poſtle S. Peter, both which had beene the Idolatrous temples of the heathen Idols, Diana and Apollo. And in the like pious zeale, many of his Succeſſors layd the foundations of many Oratories vnto Gods vſe, and became themſelues votaries therein. Such were king Sebba, who abandoning the vaine pleaſures of this life made himſelfe a Monke in the foreſaid Monaſtery. And king Sigherd his ſucceſſor, following him in the like deuotion, tooke the rules of holy religion, and in the ſame Monaſtery likewiſe, in holy contemplations ſpent the reſt of his life. In the like deuoted zeale Offa king of this Prouince, layd downe the Scepter of his kingdome, & as a Pilgrime trauailed to Rome, where in ſteed of the Crowne, he put on the Cowle, and entred a monaſticall life, wherein hee ſpent his time in holy meditations to the day of his death. Neither were theſe Kings ſo zealous alone, but that their Queenes likewiſe abandoning the glory of this world, tooke vpon them the mantles and veiles of holy Votaries, and were great inſtigators of others vnto the like. For ſo did the Queene and wife of King Sebba (whoſe name I finde not recorded by any:) Oſith, the Queene and wife of King Sighere, euen in the life time of her husband, became Abbeſſe of Berking neere London, for which, (though contrary to the precept of the Apoſtle) ſhee obtained the name of a Saint. And Kineſwith the wife of king Offa, made her ſelfe a Nunne in the Abbey of Kinsburgh, whereof her husbands ſiſter was Abbeſſe. The time of whoſe ignorances howſoeuer theſe brighter dayes doe condemne, yet by them wee may learne to adde deeds vnto knowledge, leſt knowing, and not doing, wee be beaten with many ſtripes.

The site of this Kingdom

THe site of the East-Saxons Kingdom, was the Countrey of Essex, Middlesex, and a part of Hartfordshire, and the Circuit so farre as the Dioceſſe of London now extendeth: it was bounded on the East with the Ocean; on the South with the Thames; on the West with the Colne; and on the North with the riuer Stowre. The Kings thereof claime their deſcent from Prince Woden, not as all the reſt of the Saxon Kings, but onely by a collaterall line; & Erchenwine became the firſt King, which neuer the leſſe hee held as Feodarie to the Kings of Kent. For which cauſe, it ſeemeth that Malmesbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of thoſe Kings, but maketh his ſon Sledda the firſt, and tenth in deſcent from Woden.

1. Erchenwine the firſt King of the East-Saxons.

His deſcent.

ERchenwine, is ſayd to bee the ſonne of Offa, the ſonne of Bedca, the ſonne of Sigefuget, the ſonne of Sneppa, the ſon of Antſeeg, the ſonne of Supig, the ſonne of Seaxnod, the ſonne of Woden, from whom all theſe Kings fetch their originall: His Kingdome beganne about the yeere of grace 527. and in the 15. of Eske the ſecond King of Kent; and his raigne long, but yet without any memorable acts, dying in the yeere 586. and leauing his ſonne to ſucceede in his place.

His death.

2. An. D. 587. Sledda the ſecond King. His marriage.

SLedda the ſonne of Erchenwine, ſucceeding in the East-Saxons kingdome, raigned peaceably without mention of any warres; for hauing married Ricula the daughter of Imerik King of Kent, was thereby the more fauoured of them, and feared of others; and nothing left (beſides his quiet raigne) to be recorded to poſterities; neither are many yeeres of ſucceſſions numbred, but as they are gathered from the Computations of other Princes, with whom they either liued, or were linked in action. This Sledda dyed about the yeere of our Redemption 596. and left iſſue by his wife Queene Ricula, Segebert, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, and Segebald his brother, whoſe Sonnes afterward were Kings of that Prouince.

3. An. D. 596. Sebert the time when he began to raigne.

SEbert the ſonne of Sledda and of Queene Ricula, beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation 596. and in the thirty ſixth yeere of the raigne of King Ethelbert of Kent, his mothers brother, at that time Monarch of the Engliſhmen who in Seberts chiefe City London a Princely Mart-Towne, (ſayth Beda) of many people arriuing thither both by ſea and land; new built a Church making it the Cathedrall of Biſhop Miletus, and ſo wrought with king Sebert, that hee conuerted him to Chriſtianity; and aſſiſted him in that Foundation, where formerly (ſay ſome) had ſtood the Temple of Diana. This Church theſe new Conuerts & Saxon kings, either new reared or inlarged for the honour and ſeruice of God. and dedicated vnder the name of Saint Paul: which worke Ethelbert further confirmed with ſufficient maintenance, as by this his Charter is ſeene containing theſe words: Aethelbert Rex, Deo inſpirante, pro anima ſuæ remedio, dedit Epiſcopo Mileto terram quæ appellatur Tillingham, ad Monaſterium ſiue Solatium ſcilicet S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Aethelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi Præſuli Mileto poteſtatem eius habendi & poſſidendi, vt in perpetuũ in Monaſterij vtilitate permaneat, &c. And that this was the Temple of Diana, ſome haue further confirmed vnto vs by the incredible number of Oxe-heads there digged vp in the dayes of King Edward the Firſt, when the eaſt-end of that Church was enlarged; which were ſuppoſed to bee of thoſe Beaſts that were there ſacrificed to this Goddeſſe Diana. Theſe Kings likewiſe founded the Church of S. Peter in the Weſt of London, at a place called Thornye, where ſometimes ſtood the Temple of Apollo, as Sulcardius affirmeth; which being ouerthrowne by an Earth-quake, King Lucius new built for the celebration of Gods ſeruice; and that againe being decayed, thoſe Kings reſtored it vnto a greater beauty, where Sebert, after thirteen yeres raigne; (as ſome write) with Anthelgoda his Queene were buryed: whoſe bodies in the dayes of Richard the Second (ſayth Walſing.) were tranſlated from the old Church to the new, and there interred. He had iſſue by the ſayd Queene, Sered, Seward, and Sigebert, whoſe liues and deaths were as followeth.

SEred, Seward, and Sigebert, the ſons of King Sebert, raigned as it ſeemeth, together in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons; all three wicked irreligious men, and deadly enemies to the Chriſtian Profeſſion. He was murdered by two of his kinſmen, who, as Beda ſaith, were Brethren, no other cauſe mouing them, but his ouermuch lenitie and clemency. He raigned by the foreſaid account, ſixteene yeares, leauing iſſue a young ſonne named Selred, that ſucceeded Seofrid in that Kingdome.

THE KINGDOME OF NORTHVMBERLAND, THE CIRCVIT AND CONTINVANCE, WITH THE SVCCESSIONS AND ISSVES OF THOSE Kings vnto the last subuersion thereof by King EGBERT.

CHAPTER IX.

THE ancient Inhabitants (as Xiphilinus out of Dio reporteth) inhabiting on each side of the Wale, were the Maatæ, who in their reuolt against the Romans, called to their ayde the Caledonians; which forced Severus the Emperour himselfe into Britaine. By Ptolemy they are called Ottadini, which Cambden thinketh might well bee from Attatini, and that deriued from the British word Vchtine, which signifieth aboue Tine, or on the other side of Tine, according to the site of the Country. And in the change of the name by the Saxons, the site of that Country was the cause; for it lying vpon the North of the Riuer

Humber, they named it Norþan humberlonde, rightly contracted into Northhumberland, and of three, one word is now made. What gouernment they had, before the Romans obtained it, or what Gouernor vnder them, but such as all other parts of the Iland (besides their Prefects or Lieutenants) is vncertaine: yet certaine it is, when the Saxons had got it, the Country was diuided into two Prouinces, and those called Deira, and Bernicia; which Ella and Ida two famous Captaines among them first possest, and changed the title thereof from a Dukedome vnto a Kingdome, inlarging their coasts vpon the South of Humber, and their successors vpon their fellow Kings; whose stemalike draught annexed, both in the marriages, issues, & collaterals, are therein branched as farre as any warrantable Records affordeth. And as plenteous of Saints (if Nunnes be Saints, and those sanctified that through blind zeale, leaue their duties vndischarged, to liue idle without all imployments) as any other of those Kings that put off their Crownes, to weare a Monkes Cowle. For so did two Kings of this Kingdome, foure Queenes, and fiue of their Children, besides others that vowed their pilgrimages to Rome. And King Oswald so zealous, that himselfe was the interpretor of Bishop Aidans sermons vnto his people; and the people so desirous of Christianitie, as that aboue ten thousand men, besides women and children, were in one day baptized in the Riuer Swale, by Paulinus the first Arch-Bishop of Yorke.

This Kingdome at firſt was diuided into two Prouinces, which were Deira, and Bernicia, till laſt it fell into one vnder the name of Northumberlands Kingdome.

Northumberland how diuided at first.

THis Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Prouinces: whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia; and were gouerned sometimes by their Kings seuerally, and sometimes vnder one, as successe of Warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descents of whose Kings are brought by Florentius both from the Fourth and Fifth Sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, vnder whom the Kingdome of Deira beganne, was the sonne of Iffi, who was the sonne of Wuskfrea, the sonne of Wilgils, the sonne of VVesterwalchna, the sonne of Seomel, the sonne of Swarta, the sonne of Sapugell, the sonne of Seabald, the sonne of Saggeot, the sonne of Swebdeg, the sonne of Siggar, the sonne of Weadeg, the fourth sonne of woden. And the descent of Ida, the raiser of the Bernicians Kingdome, is brought from Bealdeag the fifth sonne of woden; for Bealdeag was Father to Brand, whose sonnes were Beorn and Freodegar, the latter of which twaine was the progenitour of Cherdik the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Beorn begat another Beorn also, and hee Wegbrand the Father of Ingebrand, whose sonne was Alusa, the Father of Angengeal, and this mans sonne Ingengeat, the Father of Æthelbright, whose sonne Oesa begat Eoppa the Father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

These Saxon Captaines Ella and Ida, about sixty yeares after the death of King Hengist, changed the title of this Prouince from a Dukedome to a Kingdome. For Hengist hauing giuen the possession of those North parts vnto Otho his Brother, and to Ebusain his sonne, their Successors held it, with many hostile irruptions the space of 99. yeeres. But now the Britaines subjected, and no resistance made, those Captaines diuide the Prouince into two parts, intituling either by the name of a Kingdome; the first Deira, was possessed by Ella, which stretched from Tyne, to the Riuer Humber; and the second Bernicia, enjoyed by Ida, whose Continent lay betwixt the Tyne and the Frith of Edenborough. These together contained the Counties of Westmerland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Yorke-shire, Lancaster, and Durham: and was bounded on the West with the Irish Seas, on the North with the Wall of Seuerus, on the East with the German Ocean, and on the South with the Riuers Mersey and Humber. Ida, saith Malmesbury, raigned fourteene yeares: and Ella by Mathew of Westminster, is said to succeed him for thirtie yeares. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Huntington recordeth, were Adda, Bealric, Thedrik, Ethelric, Osmer, and Thedred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecca, Oswald, Ailrik, Sogoe, and Sogother. These (saith Mathew of Westminster) arriued at Flemisburke with fortie Shippes, and assisted their Father in many of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius his record, were Acca, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and Mother to the most Christian Oswald, Monarch of the English-men, and Edwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to beginne his raigne Anno 547. And Ella in the yeere 559. No other particulars ascribed vnto either, besides the building of Bamburge Castle.

Ethelrikes youth obscurely spent.

Ethelrik the sonne of King Ida, hauing out-run his youth in pernicious obscuritie, attained in his old yeeres to the Gouernment of both the Prouinces, and whole Kingdome of Northumberland, wherein his time was so spent (saith Malmesbury) that had not his son in the glasse of his own worths shewed the face of his Fathers remembrance, his acts and raigne might easily haue beene forgotten. His issue were Ethelfrid that succeeded him, and Theobald slaine in Battle against the Scots. He raigned fiue yeares, and dyed, An. 593.

Ethelfrid very thirsty of fame.

Ethelfrid, a man very valiant, and thirsty for renowne, succeeded his Father in the Northumbrians Kingdome. Him Beda compares to King Saul in Israel, excepting onely in the knowledge of Gods true Religion: to whom (saith he) might bee applied the saying of Iacob touching Beniamin, that like a rauening Wolfe he deuoured his prey in the morning, and diuided uided the ſpoyle thereof in the euening. For he made greater Conqueſts ouer the daily afflicted Britaines, then all the Kings of the Angles had done; and peopling their poſſeſſions with his Saxons, held the right owners vnder ſubiection and tribute. This his proſperitie Edanaden King of the Scots greatly enuied, and attempting to croppe it, and to plant himſelfe vpon the roote of like honour, hee aſſembled a great and ſtrong Army againſt him, and at the place called Degſaſton ſtrooke battle with him, wherein notwithſtanding he was ouerthrowne, and his Scots diſcomfited, yet with ſuch loſſe to King Ethelfrid, that Theobald his brother, with the part of the Army whereof he was Generall, were all vanquiſhed and deſtroied. This battle went ſo ſore againſt the Scottiſh Britaines, that (ſaith Beda) no King of that Nation durſt attempt to meet the Engliſh in the Field for a long time after. And the fortune of the day did ſo much augment both his fame, and alſo his haughty ſpirit, that preſently he reenforced his power againſt the Britaines, that were at * Cairlegion, where of them he made a moſt lamentable ſlaughter, and that not onely of the Souldiers prepared for fight, but alſo of thoſe religious and harmeleſſe Monkes, there aſſembled for prayer.

The deſcription of Bangor Monaſterie.

Theſe Monkes were of the Monaſtery of Bangor in Northwales, famous for antiquitie, forme of diſcipline, and ſpacious circuit. It was ſituated in the fruitfull valley now called the Engliſh Mailor, and vpon the Bankes of the Riuer Dee, where it extended it ſelfe as in the circuit of a walled Citie, containing within it the quantitie of a mile and halfe of ground: two of whoſe Gates may at this day eaſily be diſcerned, the one of them called Port Hogen, lying by North; and the other Port Calais, ſituate on the South; the Riuer Dee hauing now changed his Channell, runneth thorow the middeſt betwixt both the Gates, which ſtand aſunder fiue hundred paces. This Monaſtery, ſaith Clarinalentius, was the Mother of all others in the World; who in memory of the * Seuen Churches of Aſia, did diſtribute into ſeuen portions their Monkes, euery one numbering three hundred ſoules, and all of them (as Beda ſaith) liuing by the labour of their owne hands. Many of theſe aſſembling at Cair-legion, to aſſiſt their Brethren Britaines with their ſupplications vnto God againſt this Ethelfrid, ſurnamed the Wilde, and his fierce Souldiers the Infidell Saxons; with three dayes faſts ſpent their time in continuall prayers. But King Ethelfrid beholding their manner, demanded the cauſe: and vnderſtanding that they called for aſſiſtance of their God againſt him and his Army, ſet firſt vpon their Guarder Brockmal, a man of Armes, who to ſaue his owne life, left all theirs to the ſword; wherein periſhed one thouſand and two hundred Chriſtian Monkes, beſides the diſcomfiture of the Britaines Hoſt. Many of theſe were interred in their owne Monaſteries, whoſe bodies, ſaith Leyland, haue beene found in the memory of man, in the rotten weedes wherein they were ſlaine. But as his fame increaſed daily abroad, ſo were his feares augmented continually at home. For Edwine the ſonne of Ella, and third King of Deira, a gallant young Prince; and newly ſeated in his fathers Kingdome, wrought many ſuſpicions in Ethelfrids head; and though he was brother to his Wife Acca, yet the neereneſſe of that alliance, no whit diminiſhed his zealous conceits, whom therefore by priuy conſpiracies and apparant purſuits hee ſo daily moleſted, that he was forced to ſaue his life by auoiding the Country, and toſſed in exile from place to place, was laſtly receiued and ſuccoured by Redwald, King of the Eaſt-Angles, who in his quarrell forthwith aſſembled his forces, and meeting Ethelfrid in the field, ſlew him neere the Riuer Idle, after he had raigned twentie three yeeres, in the yeere of Chriſt his Incarnation 617. Hee had iſſue by his Wife Acca (the daughter of Ella) Eanfrith King of Bernicia, Oſlafe, and Oſwald King of Northumberland, Oſlake, and Offa, with two Daughters canonized for Saints, Oſwith and Ebba the Nunne; as alſo by his Concubine, Oſwy the tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen.

EDwine thus raiſed by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Country, and was of the Inhabitants made King of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Engliſh-men; as in their ſucceſſion ſhall be declared. Beda (ſomewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this ſtory: That whileſt hee lay baniſhed in King Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid inſtigated his receiuer, by promiſes to take away his life: or if he refuſed, threatned him wars: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to this wicked purpoſe, reuealed the ſame

His life in danger.

Edwine in doubt what to doe. One vnknown came to him, demanding the cause of his sorrow.

same to the Queene his wife; which a friend of Edwine hearing, told him of his danger, and wished him to flie. Edwine thus perplexed with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, sate solitary vnder a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done; to suspect and flie from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong; and to thinke himselfe safe in other Prouinces against so powerfull pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approached a man vnto him, vtterly vnknowne, who after salutation, demanded the cause why hee sate at so vnseasonable a time, in so vncouth a place, and pensiue manner? Edwine thinking him to be his death's-man, resolutely answered; It nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (said he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus vpon that stone; thy death is pretended, and euen at hand: but what wouldest thou giue to rid thee of that danger, and to make King Redwald thy assured preseruer? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (said the other) that shall set thee vpon the Throne of thy Kingdome, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors euer attained vnto? I would be thankfull to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times, as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, said he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserue the life of thy soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents euer heard of, wilt thou consent and imbrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not be ruled by him, that thus should free me from this present danger, set me vpon the throne of a Kingdome, and after these great fauours, should also teach me the way to an eternall life. Vpon this answere, laying his right hand on Edwines head, he said vnto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despaire, his friend that had forewarned him of his death, came hastily to him with a more cheerfull countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and surcease thy cares, for the Queene hath not onely changed Redwalds minde to saue thy life, but he also hath granted to maintaine thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly he did, and slew him as we haue said.

But because we shall haue occasion to speake of this Edwine as he was Monarch of the English-men, wee will reserue his Acts, Issues, and Raigne, to be further related in the course of his Succession. He was slaine in battle against Cadwall King of the Britaines and Penda King of the Mercians, when he had prosperously raigned seuenteene yeeres, the twelfth of October; Anno 633. and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Withby. Eclipses of the Sunne and Moone.

gles, Sebbi and Offa Kings of the East-Saxons, and Ceolnulph and this Egbert Kings of the Northumbrians. These forsaking the world (as they tooke it) left the Charge that God vpon them had imposed, whose authoritie in earth they swayed, and wherein they might much more haue aduanced Gods glory and Christs Gospell, then for a more easie priuate and safe life, not warranted by his word, but rather disliked, and perhaps foreshewed by those heauenly creatures the Sunne and Moone, which in those dayes were fearefully darkned, and for a time seemed to haue lost their light: for Anno 733. 18. Calend. Septemb. the Sunne suffered so great an Eclipse, that the earth seemed to be ouer-shadowed as with sackcloth. And Anno 756. 8. Calend. Decemb. the Moone being in her full, appeared both darke and bloudy; for a Starre (though there be none lower then the Moone) seemed to follow her, and to depriue her of light: but passing before her, shee againe recouered her former brightnesse. This King Egbert had a brother that bore the same name, and was installed Archbishop of Yorke, where he erected a beautifull Library (a worke well befitting a noble Prelate) and plentifully stored it with an infinite number of learned books. His sonne was Oswulph, that succeeded in the Kingdome.

Alured, the murderer of his Lord and Master, beganne his raigne ouer the Kingdome of Northumberland, the yeare of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred sixty-fiue, and continued the same with such dislikes, that he lastly was expelled out of the Prouince by his owne subiects, and enforced to abandon the same. 22. An. D. 778. Alfwald.

Alfwald the brother of the foresaid King Alured aspiring to the Soueraignty of the Northumbrians, ruled the same in great Iustice, to his worthy commendations: notwithstanding the wickednes of his people was such, that without all guilt he was trayterously murthered by the conspiracy of Siga, 23. Sept. the yeare of Christs Incarnation, seuen hundred eighty eight, after he had raigned eleuen yeares, and his body buried at Hexham. CHAPTER X.

THE Mercian Kingdome conteined more Countryes, and circuit of ground, then any other of the Saxons Heptarchy. For it spread it selfe through the heart of the Iland, euen from Humber in the North, neere vnto the Riuer Thamesis in the South: hauing no lesse then seuenteene Shires (as now they are deuided) and six seuerall Estates, as Ptolemy hath seated them, vnder their command. The first Saxon King of this Kingdome was Crida, the eleuenth in descent from Prince Woden: and the laſt in a lineall ſucceſſion from him, was Ceolwulfe, the fifteenth King of that Kingdome, beſides fiue other collateralls, that by intruſion put on the Crowne. Their iſſues were many, as in the ſtemme annexed is to be ſeene, and therein their matches or marriages, their Armes or Atchieuements, as the ancient haue deliuered, and the modern haue receiued, are according inſculpted from the authoritie of both. Theſe Mercians as they were many, ſo were they ſtrong, and by ſtrong hand might of their Kings in a continued ſucceſſion, got and kept the Emperiall Crowne of the Heptarchy. For though thoſe Kings raigned as Kings in their owne Territories; yet among them euer one was the ſupreme head of the reſt, and was called King of Engle-lond, till Egbert the Weſt-Saxon laid all into one. Neither were their Kings more ſtrong then they were pious, after they had beene wet in the Lauer of Baptiſme, themſelues and children ſhewing their faiths by their workes, in building of Churches, Monaſteries and Hoſpitalls; and ſome of them were ſo zealous in the doctrine then taught, as they laid away their robes, and tooke the tonſure or habite of Monkes. For ſo did two of their Kings, Ethelred and Kendred; the one cowled in Brandney, & the other in Rome: where likewiſe great Offa through the like zeale, made his Kingdome tributary to the yearely payment of Peter-pence vnto the Pope. Two of their Queenes, Ermenheld, and Ethelſwith, vailed themſelues Nunnes, the one in Ely, and the other in Paduah: and of their Princely iſſues, three were crowned with martyrdome, and nine more canonized for Saints. But to detaine thee no longer, ſee, if thou pleaſe, theſe Mercian Kings branched from firſt vnto laſt.

Mercia.

THis Kingdome of Mercia contained more Counties, and the skirts of that royall Tent were ſpread with a wider compaſſe then any of the reſt in the Saxons Heptarchy: for in the middeſt of the Iland this Kingdome was ſeated, and from the verge of Northumberland, touched ſome part of Middleſex, which was the poſſeſſion of the Eaſt-Saxons: The North thereof was bounded with Humber and Merſey; the Eaſt was incloſed with the German Ocean; the Weſt extended to Seuerne and Dee; and the South part neerely touched the Riuer of Thames; containing the Counties now known by theſe names, of Cheſſhire, Darby-ſhire, Nottingham, Stafford, and Shrop-ſhire, Northampton, Leiceſter, Lincolne, Huntington, and Rutland-ſhires; Warwicke, Worceſter, Oxford, and Glouceſter-ſhires; Buckingham, Bedford, and part of Hertford-ſhire. The firſt raiſer of that Title and name of a Kingdome was Crida the ſonne of Kenwald, who was the ſonne of Cnebba, the ſonne of Ichell, the ſonne of Eomer, the ſonne of Engengeate, the ſonne of Offa, the ſonne of Weremund, the ſonne of Withleg, the ſonne of Waga, the ſonne of Wethelgeate, the third of the fiue ſonnes of Prince Woden. This man, without more fame of his further acts, is ſaid to haue raigned the ſpace of tenne yeares, and to haue died Anno 594. His iſſue was Wibba that ſucceeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Quenburge, matched in marriage with Edwin afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom ſhee liued in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and dyed before him in that his baniſhment. She bore him two ſons, Oſfrid and Edfride, as in ſucceſſion of Edwines Monarchy ſhall bee ſhewed: notwithſtanding Beda reporteth this Quenburge to be daughter of Ceorl, the third King of Mercia, and grand-childe to this firſt Crida.

Againſt Kingils and Quincheline, Kings together of the weſt-Saxons, he joyned battell neere vnto the Citie Cirencheſter, where both the parties fought it it out to the vtmoſt, with the effuſion of much Saxons bloud: but thoſe comming to concord, he with Cadwallo King of the Britaines, ſlew in battle, Edwine and Oſwald, Kings of Northumberlands; Sigebert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the Eaſt-Angles, and forced Kenwald King of the Weſt-Saxons, out of his Country, in quarrell of his Siſter. Of theſe his proſperities hee became ſo proud, that he thought nothing impoſſible for his atchieuement; and therefore threatning the deſtructiō of the Northumbers, prepared his Army for that expedition. Oſwy then raigning King of that Country, proffered great ſummes of money, and moſt precious Iewels to purchaſe his peace: which being refuſed, and the battle joyned, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was ſlaine, and his whole Army diſcomfited. His Baptisme receiued, to witnesse the first fruits of his profession, he laid the foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamsted, now called Peterborow, but liued not to finish the same, for that he was slaine by the treason of Alkfled his wife in the celebration of Easter, (as Beda saith) hauing had no issue by her. But Robert de Swapham (an Author of good antiquitie, who saw the stones of that foundation to be so huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) saith, that Peada was brought to his end by the practise of his Mother, and not of his wife; as in these his words is manifest: Peada (saith he) laid the foundation of a Monastery at Medeshamsted, in the Giruians or Fen-Country, which he could not finish, for that by the wicked practise of his Mother, he was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Christian Lady, and brands the face of her that most deserueth it. This King raigning as substitute to King Oswy of Northumberland aforesaid, by some is not accounted for a Mercian King, his Regiment resting vnder the command of another.

Bernulfe obtaining what he ſo long deſired; made himſelfe King when Ceolwolfe was gone, and was the more approued for his valour in Armes, and the leſſe reſiſted for his ancient deſcent, being ſprung from Oſher, a man reputed to be of the Mercian royall bloud. But Bernulfe perceiuing the fortunes of Egbert, accounted thoſe his happy ſucceſſes to be his owne ſhame, and by defiance chalenged the Weſt-Saxons to the field: which Egbert accepted, and vpon Ellendon joyned battle with the Mercians, which was fought to the much loſſe of both their blouds. Notwithſtanding at laſt the Weſt-Saxons preuailed, Bernulfe being forced to flie with ſhame. The Eaſt-Angles that then had yeelded to Egbert, and but lately before had felt the fury of Bernulfe, thought the time fit to repay him againe, and therfore in warlike manner aſſaulted his Territories, where he, in defending his Countrey againſt their attempts, was in a skirmiſh ſlaine, after hee had raigned fully three yeares.

Ludecan then was choſen King of the Mercians, whoſe bloud was not down ſince their laſt loſſe, neither reuenge forgotten againſt the Eaſt-Angles; and therefore the yeare following made ſtrength (ſufficient to their ſeeming) to meet theſe their enemies. But the State of Heptarchy now drawne to the period, and the Supporters thereof weakned by their owne diuiſions, the Iland declined to a preſent alteration, and gaue place to a more abſolute kinde of Monarchy, that in Egbert the Weſt-Saxon was now begun; who ayding the Eaſt-Angles againſt the Mercians, Ludecan their King fought with no better ſucceſſe then Bernulfe before him had done, whoſe raigne laſted not fully two yeares; nor his memoriall reuiued either in wife or iſſue.

Withlafe, the ſon of Oſwald, the ſon of Oſher, of the Mercian bloud-royall, intruding himſelfe (as it ſeemeth) into the Gouernment of Mercia, was vnexpectedly vanquiſhed by Egbert the Monarch that had aſſumed from Bernulfe that Kingdome before: him hee made his Subſtitute and Tributary, who ſo continued to Egbert and his ſonne the time of thirteene yeares, leauing no other relation of his acts. His iſſue was Wigmund, the husband of Lady Elfled, the daughter of Ceolwulfe King of Mercia, the parents of Wyſtan the Martyr, and of Lady Edburg, married to one Etheland an Earle in the Prouince of Lincolne.

Berthulfe vpon the like compoſition of Tribute, and in the like termes of ſubjection to the VVeſt-Saxons ſoueraigntie, held the Kingdome of Mercia as a Subſtitute, and without any notable report of his Acts, ſo raigned the ſpace of thirteene yeares. At this time the Sea-rouers out of Denmarke, that had often infeſted this Iland with their many Inuaſions, got the head ſo ſtrong, and wing ſo farre, euen to the middle part thereof, (as this of Mercia was) that they filled with terror the hearts of the Inhabitants, and ſtained the ſoyle with the bloud of their ſides; which in a moſt barbarous cruelty daily they ſhed: whoſe rage was ſo great, and mindes ſo vnſatiable, that Berthulfe was enforced to forſake the Country, and in a more priuate eſtate to ſecure his owne life. He had a ſonne named Berefred, who was the cauſer of Saint Wyſtans Martyrdome.

BVrdred the laſt Mercian King, was thereunto deputed by Ethelwolfe the VVeſt-Saxon Monarch, as a ſhield of defence againſt the raging Danes, that made deſolations where they came. In continuall imployments againſt them he ſpent his time; and that with ſuch noble reſolutions and manhood, that Ethelwolfe held him worthy of his alliance; and made him his ſonne in law, by giuing him Lady Ethelſwith his daughter to Wife, the marriage being ſolemnized at Chippham in Wils-ſhire, with great eſtate. This Burdred with Ethelwolfe, warred againſt the Britaines with victory, and he with Alured compelled the Danes vnder the conduct of Hungar and Hubba, to diſlodge from Nottingham, and depart the Prouince. Yet laſtly, after twenty two yeares raigne, he was ſo ouer-laid with their daily ſupplies, that three of their Kings (as our Writers terme them) whoſe names were Godrun, Esketell, and Ammond, wintred at * Ripindon, and ſore waſted his Kingdome.

King Burdred at that time diſtreſſed, and himſelfe not able to withſtand their rage, with his wife Queene Ethelſwith fled the Realme, and the ſame yeare in Rome ended his life, and was buried in the Church of our Lady belonging to the Engliſh Colledge there erected. His Queene in the habit of a Nunne, fifteene yeares after his death, died at Padua in Italy, and was there honourably buried, the yeare of our Lord eight hundred eightie-nine. And now the fatall circle of this Mercian Kingdome drawne to the full compaſſe, ſtayed the hand of all glorious motion from proceeding any further, and with the lot of the reſt fell vnder the gouernment of the Weſt-Saxons, after one yeeres vſurpation of the Danes, when it had ſtood in ſtate of a Kingdome the ſpace of two hundred and two yeares, and ended in title and regall authoritie, the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation eight hundred eighty ſix.

CHAPTER XI.

THE East-Angles Kingdome (conteyning Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely) was raised to the height of a Kingdome, by Vffa a Saxon Captaine, and the people thereof from him were called Vffines a long time after. but his greater by farre, was Redwald, the third King of this Prouince, who got, and wore, the Emperiall Crowne of the Monar-

Monarchy. Sixteene Kings of this Kingdome ſucceſſiuely raigned from Vffa to Edmund, whoſe matches, iſſues, and other collateralls, are in the draught annexed, preſented to thy ſight, with the Armes or Atchieuements, that the ancient haue giuen them, and the moderne admitted: which I for my part had rather ſubſcribe vnto, then to ranſcate the rubbiſh of times ruines, and get onely labour for my paines. The firſt King of the East-Angles that profeſſed Chriſtianitie, was Erpenwald, but with ſuch diſlikes to his people, as they entred into conſpiracy, and trayterouſly murthered him. But his ſonne in law Sigebert, with a further foreſight, laid the foundation deeper, then the ſtep-father had done. For he built a Schoole, for the education of children, that the veſſell might be ſeaſoned to receiue that heauenly liquor, vnto which ceſterne, through the conduits of Felix and others, thoſe waters of life, ſo plenteouſly ranne, that King Sigebert himſelfe deſcended his throne, and in Cumbreburg Abbey ſpent the reſt of his life in holy meditations. And Anna King of this Prouince, was ſo happy in his children, that moſt of them are commended vnto poſterities by the names of Saints. For ſo was Lady Etheldrid, who being twice married, and more then twelue yeares in that eſtate, liuing in perfect Virginitie, and againſt the conſents of both her huſbands, tooke the vaile of a Nunne at Coldingham, and afterwards became Abbeſſe of Ely. Her ſiſter Sexburg Queene of Kent, and a mother of foure children, after her husbands deceaſe, became a Nunne likewiſe, ſucceeding Queene Segbur, Abbeſſe of the ſame Monaſtery, wherein Lady Nithgith their younger ſiſter with them was a Menchion. Ethilburg the third daughter of King Anna, was made Abbeſſe of Berking, a foundation of her brother Erkinwalds Biſhoppe of London. And Lady Withburg a natural daughter of the ſaid King, with Sedrido the daughter of his Wife, went into France, and in Saint Brigges Monaſtery, ſucceeded each others the Abbaſes; ſo full of deuotions, and ſo fruitleſſe of bodies, were all theſe Princes, excepting Queene Sexburg. But had not their guides beene blinded, and altogether ignorant in the Scriptures, they might haue knowne, that God in that ſexe required procreation. For, to increaſe and multiply was the woman created, and by Faith and child-bearing is to be ſaued. 1 Tim. 2. 15.

The circuit of this Province.

THe Counties (as wee now call them) that were ſubject to this Eaſt-Angles Kingdome, were Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge-ſhire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds whereof were limitted in this manner: the Eaſt and North ſides were confined by the Ocean; the Weſt, with Saint Edmunds Ditch, and the South altogether with Eſſex, and ſome part of Hertfordſhire.

1. An. D. 575. The firſt King of the Eaſt-Angles. Beda hiſt. Ang. lib 2, cap. 15.

The firſt raiſer of the title and State of this Kingdome, was a Saxon Captaine named Vffa, about the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation fiue hundred ſeuentie fiue, whoſe renowne was ſuch, that he gaue name not onely to that his aſpired Dominion, but alſo from him, the Subiects thereof were a long time after called Vffins: though laſtly, it was reduced into the name and Kingdome of the Eaſt-Angles. This Vffa (as Florentius the Monke of Worceſter hath laid downe) was the ſon of Withelin, and he the ſonne of Hrippus, the ſonne of Rothmund, the ſonne of Trigils, the ſonne of Titmon, the ſonne of Caſer, the ſecond ſonne of Prince Woden. His raigne is accounted onely ſeuen yeeres, without any mention of further matter, worthy the recording, and his death to haue hapned in the yeare fiue hundred eighty one.

Titulus, the ſecond King of the Eaſt-Engles, and onely ſonne of Vffa that is read of, beganne his raigne the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation, fiue hundred eighty three, and continued the ſame for the ſpace of twentie yeares. And although the Writers of theſe times haue made no further mention of his Acts, yet may we well ſuppoſe that his dayes were not altogether ſo quietly ſpent, both in the infancy of that newly erected Kingdome, and when ſuch warres were commenced for the obtaining the whole Iland. His iſſue was Redwald, that immediately ſucceeded him, and from whom other Kings of that Kingdome were lineally deſcended.

Redwald, the greateſt of all the Eaſt-Angles Kings, ſucceeded his father Titulus in the dominions of the Eaſt-Angles, and Ethelbert of Kent in the Monarchy of the Saxons. He receiued and ſuccoured in his Court Edwine with his Wife in their Exiles, and aſſiſted him againſt Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, that ſought his life, as before we haue ſhewed, and hereafter in the ſucceſſion of his Monarchy wee ſhall haue further occaſion to ſhew. He raigned Monarch eight yeeres, and King of the Eaſt-Angles 31. (by the account and computation of the Table annexed to Malmesbury, and others of our Engliſh Writers) and died the yeare of our Saluation ſixe hundred twenty three.

4. An. D. 624. The fourth King of this Kingdome.

Erpenwald, the younger ſonne of King Redwald, (Reynhere his elder brother being ſlaine in battle by Ethelfred in the quarrell of diſtreſſed Edwine) ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdome of the Eaſt-Angles, the yere of our Lord God ſix hundred twenty foure. He was the firſt King of that Prouince, that publikely profeſſed the Chriſtian Faith, which he receiued at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of King Edwine of Northumberland; but ſo much to the diſcontentment and grudge of the people, as thereupon they preſently entred into conſpiracy to practiſe his death; which a Pagan Ruffian named Richebert, not long after moſt traiterouſly executed. His raigne is placed in the foreſaid Table of our Writers, (as it is compared with the other Kings of thoſe times) to extend twelue yeares; after whoſe death, thoſe people returned to their wonted Idolatry, and for three yeeres continuance embraced their former Gentilitie, from which they were reclaimed by Sigebert his brother in law, who ſucceeded him in his Throne, he hauing no iſſue, to whom it might be left.

Sigebert the ſonne of the ſecond Wife to Redwald, and by her borne to a former husband, whoſe name as vnknowne, was greatly miſtruſted by his Father in law, King Redwald, that he went about to aſpire his Crowne: the motiues of which ſuſpition, notwithſtanding all the endeuours of innocent Sigebert, were ſtill followed with an enuious eye, and his ſubiectiue ſemblances, as notes of popularitie, were euer conceiued to aime at the ſupreme authoritie: which blot of iealouſie, when it could no otherwiſe be wiped out, he abandoned the Court of the King, and Country of his birth; and in France as an exile, all the time of Redwald the Father, and likewiſe in the raigne of Erpenwald the ſonne, ſpent his time in ſtudy of good Literature, and contemplatiue exerciſes; where learning the truth of Chriſts Doctrine, and hauing receiued the lauer of Baptiſme, after the death of this ſaid Erpenwald his allied Brother, returned, and was made King of the Eaſt-Angles.

This they thought to be found not without miracle, and therefore most fit to intombe her corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had beene the place of Sigeberts Schoole, he mentioneth not. But to returne: Sigebert being wearied with the waightie affayres of this world, laid the burden thereof vpon Egricke his kinsman, and shore himselfe a Monke in the Abbey of Cumbreburg, which himselfe had built: and wherein he liued, vntill that wicked Penda, the Mercian King, with his heathenish cruelty molested the peace of the East-Angles; who after long resistãce, finding themselues too weake, besought Sigebert for the better encouragement of their souldiers, to shew himselfe in field; which when hee refused, by constraint (saith Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them he was staine in battle, vsing no other weapon for defence, sauing onely a white wand, when he had raigned onely three yeeres, and left no issue to suruiue him, that is any where recorded.

ETHelbert, the ſonne of King Ethelred, after his fathers death was ordained King of the Eaſt-Angles, whoſe dayes of youth were ſpent in learning and deedes of charitie, and the whole time of his gouernment in continuall tranquilitie, for he is recorded to be a Prince religious and charitable, ſober, profound, and wiſe in counſell. This King being incited by Offa the Mercian (that ſtill thirſted after greatneſſe) to marry Elfryd his Daughter, a Lady of great beautie, came vpon that purpoſe to Offa his Court, then ſeated at Sutton Wallis in the Counrie of Hereford, and was by him there cruelly murthered at the inſtigation of Quindrid his vnkinde (intended) mother in Law; no other occaſion miniſtred, but the greatneſſe of his Port, that much in her eyes ouer-heighted her husbands. His Bride-bed (the graue) was firſt at Merden, North from Sutton vpon the Riuer Lug. But afterwards vpon repentance, Offa remooued it vnto Hereford, ouer whom, Milfrid an vnder King of the Mercians, built a moſt faire Church in memoriall of him, which yet beares his name, and is the Cathedrall of that See. His Bride, Lady Elfrid, much lamenting his cõtriued murther, withdrew her ſelfe to Crowland in the Fennes, and there vowed chaſtitie all the dayes of her life; notwithſtanding ſome affirme that ſhee was wife to King Kenwolfe, the ſucceſſour of her brother Egfrid. This King raigned the ſpace of fortie fiue yeeres, as is ſet in the Table of our Engliſh Writers, and died in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation ſeuen hundred ninetie three, the eighteenth day of May; and his Kingdome intruded vpon by the Mercians, hauing had neither wife nor children, that Hiſtorians make mention of: after whoſe death the Kingdome of the Eaſt-Angles was brought to decay, both by the Mercians, Weſt-Saxons, and them of Kent; ſo that by meanes of their violence, that Prouince was deſtitute of her owne Gouernours, the ſpace of ſeuentie ſeuen yeeres, vntill laſtly the aſſaults of the Danes (a new-come Gueſt and moſt dangerous Enemie) cauſed the other Kings to ſtand vpon their Guards, and rather to defend what they alreadie had gotten, then to ſeeke inlargement, to the hazard of all: at which time, it is ſaid one Offa, to whom the right of that Crowne belonged, vpon a religious deuotion, tooke his pilgrimage to the Sepulcher of Chriſt, and viſiting in his way a kinſman of his, whoſe name was Alkmuud, at the Citie Norhenberge in Saxony, there made his will, wherein he adopted young Edmund his Heire, the ſonne of Alkmund: and accompliſhing his voyage, in his returne dyed at the Port Saint George, from whence he ſent young Edmund his Ring, and therewith ordained him King of the Eaſt-Angles. Alkmund a Prince of great power in thoſe parts, maintained his ſonnes rightfull election, and with a ſufficient power ſent him to claime the Kingdõme. Theſe landing in the Eaſt of England, at a place called Maydenbourc, built a royall Tower, which he named, and to this day is called, Hunſtantone, ſituated vpon the North-weſt point of Norfolke, that beareth likewiſe his owne name.

Offa heire to the Crowne, adopteth Edmund the ſon of Alkmund.

EDmund thus arriued, was as willingly receiued, and by the Eaſt-Angles made their King; in whoſe time Hungar and Hubba, two Daniſh Captaines, with an innumerable multitude of Heathen Danes, entred the Land at the mouth of Humber, and from thence inuaded Nottingham, Yorke, and Northumberland, where (without reſpect of age or ſex) they laid all waſte, and left the Land whence they departed like to a deſolate Wilderneſſe. From thence they came with the like fury into Edmunds Territories, and ſacked Thetford a frequent Citie in thoſe dayes: but he not able to withſtand their violence, fled into his Caſtle at Framingham, wherein he was of them beſieged; and laſtly, taken (ſaith Abba Floriacenſis) in a village then called Hegliſdune, of a wood bearing the ſame name; or rather ther yeelded himselfe to their torments, to saue more Christian bloud: for it is recorded, that because of his most constant Faith & Profession, those Pagans first beat him with battes, then scourged him with whips, he still calling vpon the name of Iesus, for rage whereof, they bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death; and cutting off his head, contemptuously threw it into a bush, after he had raigned ouer the East-Angles the space of sixteene yeeres, hauing had neither wife nor issue that is read of. His body and head (after the Danes were departed) were buried at the same royall Towne, as Abba termes it, where Sigebert the East-Anglean King, and one of his predecessors, at his establishing of Christianitie, built a Church, and where afterwards (in honour of him) was built another most spacious, of a wonderful frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne, vpon the occasion of his buriall, called vnto this day, Saint Edmondsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Pagan Danish King, in impiety and fury burned to ashes. But when his sonne Canute had made conquest of this Land, and gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified and affrighted (as saith the Legend) with a vision of the seeming Saint Edmund, in a religious deuotion to expiate his Fathers sacriledge, built it anew most sumptuously, enriched this place with Charters and Gifts, and offered his owne Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund, the East-Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, and so continued about some fiftie yeeres, vntill that Edward surnamed the Elder, expulsed these Danes, and ioyned that Kingdome a Prouince to the West-Saxons, after it had stood three hundred fiftie three yeeres.

CHAPTER XII.

NOw as wee haue spoken of euery seuerall Saxon King, that attained vnto, and held possession of any part in the East and South of this Iland, vntill such time as their Crownes were worne by their Conquerours, and the seuenfold diuided Heptarchy, vnited into an absolute Monarchy: so by order of History it is required, that their opposers (the Britaines) so long as they kept their ground, and stood in defence of their owne rightfull inheritance, should be shewed: who with a great disdaine, and valorous resistance, vnder-went the yoake of the Saxons subiections, as their ancient Ancestors had endeuoured to cleere themselues from the chaines of the Romanes captiuitie. And vnder God and destiny withdrew from them the hand of defence, they mated the Saxons in all their designes. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the Land of her strength, and the aspired Vortigern, called in these Strangers for his defence: yet their purposes being wisely perceiued, the preuention thereof was presently practized, and eargerly pursued, whilest the pillars (that supported the frame of their Gouernment) stood vpon their owne Bases. But the ground-worke failing, and those proppes not many, the waight of all fell vpon some few, whose acts and manly resistance (Christ assisting) shall further be related, as time shall bring them to the yeeres of their aduentures, and carry our History thorow the affayres of their times. Meane while, as wee haue recorded the names of their Ancestors, and worthy forerunners runners, the reſiſters of the Romanes: ſo now if you pleaſe, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the foreſaid Vortigern (the firſt ſubdued by theſe Saxons) vnto Cadwallader the laſt of thoſe Britiſh Princes; who left to them his Land, and went himſelfe to Rome: whoſe times and ſtories, according to thoſe Guides that lead vs, wee will declare, referring the credit thereof to our Britiſh Hiſtorians; againſt whom howſoeuer ſome exceptions are, and may be iuſtly taken; yet are they not altogether to be caſt off, in the affayres of theſe enſuing Princes, eſpecially Gyldas and Ninius, who liued in, and preſently after the times of thoſe reſiſters. Neither is it to be doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no leſſe carefull for tranſferring the remembrance of their Anceſtors actions to poſteritie, (no Nation liuing, being more zealouſly deuoted in that kinde,) though their writings haue in Times ruines beene buryed, and their remembrances preſerued onely by perpetuitie of traditions. And although wee haue ſhewed the ancient Coines of the Britaines, and obſerued a ſeries thorow the Romanes ſucceſſion: yet be not offended, that I leaue onely Blankes for theſe latter Princes; as alſo the firſt Saxons, wanting the Monies of their own ſeuerall Mints.

Vortigern the firſt and Cadwallador the laſt reſiſter of the Saxons.

Such therefore as I haue found of any Kings ſtamp, raigning whileſt the Land was diuided and enioyed amongſt them, I haue in the margent of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to euery ſeuerall Kingdome: and hence will obſerue the ſame order, without any inuention or fained inſcription: which howſoeuer wee want to furniſh their ſucceſſions, yet this I am ſure of, no Nation in Europe can ſhew the like, or can come to ſo true a ſeries of their Soueraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

A ſucceſſiue ſeries of Great Britaines Coines.

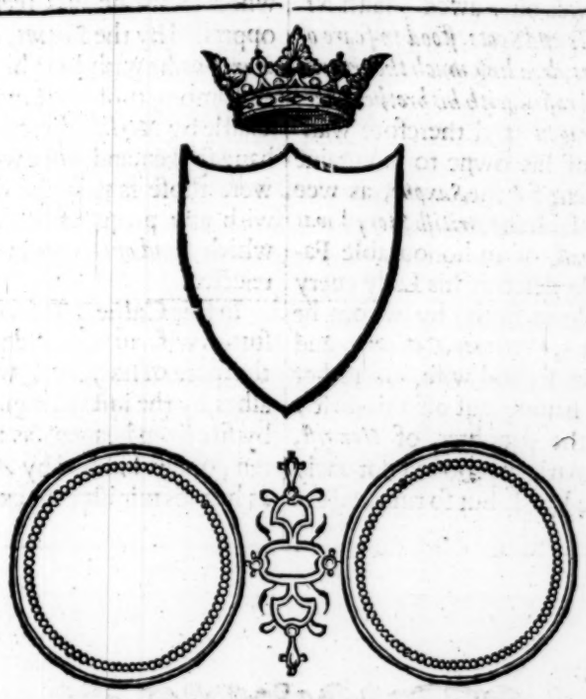
VORTIGERN. 1.



Vortigern among the many moleſtations of the Scots and Picts, was ordained ſupreme Gouernor of theſe affaires; and to that end, with the Britaines full conſent was elected their King. For as touching that Monkiſh Conſtantine, the ſonne of Conſtantius, who is ſuppoſed to be the brother of Aldreonus, King of Little Britaine in France, ſent for and made King by theſe Britaines, whoſe ſimplicitie this Vortigern is ſaid to abuſe, and laſtly, to cauſe his murther and death; I rather thinke the ſtory to be the ſame that happened aboue fortie yeeres before, in the dayes of Honorius the Emperor, when Conſtantius among the other conſpirators was raiſed vpon a hopefull expectation conceiued of his name.

This Conſtantius indeed had a ſon that bare his name, a man of a ſoft ſpirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monke. But his father riſen to his aſpiring honour, created him firſt his Caſar, and next Auguſtus, till Fortune turned thoſe ſmiles into frownes, and ſtained their purple robes in both their own blouds. For not onely the ſame names induceth this doubt, but the place, which was Wincheſter; and the Abbey Amphibilus, where this Imperiall Monke was ſhorne, doth not a little confirme the ſame: the remaines of which Colledge, by that ſtrong and thicke wall ſtanding to this day at the Weſt gate of that Cathedrall Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we muſt follow for theſe times men of later yeeres, and not without ſome ſuſpect of vncertainty. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, haue purpoſely concealed all Victors and Victories againſt themſelues, neither but ſparingly haue recorded their owne.

Saxons haue concealed all Victories againſt themſelues.

This Vortigern, howſoeuer attaining the Crowne, was ouer-awed (ſaith Ninius) by the Picts and Scots, ſtood in feare of the Roman forces, dreading much the returne of Aurelius Ambroſius with his brother Vter, ſurnamed Pendragon: and therefore wanting ſtrength of his owne to maintaine his ſtanding, ſent for the Saxons, as wee haue ſaid. He (ſaith the Britiſh Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an honourable Family and noble deſcent, his Lady euery way anſwerable to both; by whom he had three ſonnes, Vortimer, Catigern, and Paſcentius. His ſecond wife, or rather Concubine, (hauing caſt off this firſt) was Rowena, the daughter of Hengiſt, which Pagan mariage prooued not onely the bane of the Land, but ſo ruinated the Church of Chriſtianitie, that a Prouincial Councell of the Britaines was aſſembled in An. 470. to repaire thoſe things that this mariage had decayed.

By this Heathen Damoſell he had a daughter, who (againſt the law of God and Nature) was his third wife, that Kings (as he pretended, to excuſe his inceſt) might be deſcended from the right iſſue of Kings; vpon whom he begot his ſad lamenting ſonne Fauſtus, a vertuous Impe of thoſe impious parents, that ſpent his life in a ſolitary place neere to the Riuer Llynterrenny, as we haue ſaid; who abandoning the cõpany of men, among thoſe mountaines ſerued God in continuall teares and prayers, for remiſſion of the fault committed in his inceſtuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the reſtitution of his Country to her former libertie.

His third wife was his owne daughter.

Fauſtus the ſonne of Vortigern by his third wife.

This Vortigern raigned firſt ſixteene yeeres, and then depoſed for his fauours to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Vortimer his ſonne, after whoſe death he was reeſtabliſhed: but oppreſſed by the Saxons, and purſued by Aurelius, he withdrew himſelf into Wales, and among thoſe vaſt mountaines built a Caſtle by Merlins direction, whereof we haue ſpoken, and more we would ſpeake, were thoſe fantaſticke fictions vnderſet with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand. of Cheſter in his dayes vtterly reiected.

The place of the second battle.

The place of the third battle.

The place of the fourth battle.

Vortimer, the eldest son of King Vortigern, through the abuse of his Fathers gouernment, for which he was deposed by his owne Subiects, was erected King of the Britains the yeer from Christs birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether he imployed for the redresse of his country, according to the testimony of William Malmsbury. Vortimer (saith he) thinking it not good to dissemble the matter, for that he saw himselfe and Country daily surprised by the craft of the English, set his full purpose to drive them out, and from the seuenth yeere after their first entrance, for twentie yeeres continuance fought many Battles with them, and foure of them with great puissance in open field; in the first whereof, they departed with like fortune, and losse of the Generals brethren, Horsa and Catigern: in the other three the Britaines went away with victory, and so long vntill Vortimer was taken away by fatall death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randulphus, and Fabian, name both the places and successe of those Battles: The first was in Kent, and vpon the Plaine neere vnto Ailsford, where the memoriall of Catigern to this day remaineth; and Horsted doth as yet relish of Horsa there interred. The second Battle was fought likewise in Kent at Crocanford (now Craford) where many perished as well Britaines as Saxons. The third was at Weppeds Fleet, with great losse to the Britaines: and the fourth vpon Calmore, where many of the Saxons, after long and sore fight were slaine, and more drowned in flight, and lastly driuen into the Ile of Thanet, their first assigned habitation, (if not ouer the Seas) so that small hope rested for them so long as this valiant Vortimer liued, who had now dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in the Ile of Thanet likewise, as Fabian confidently affirmeth.

The Saxons quite dispossessed.

But destiny going forward for the downfall of Britaine, remooued these rubbes out of her way: for Rowena, the mother of the Britaines mischiefe, and the maintainer of the Saxons residence, found the meanes to make this worthy Vortimer away, and by poyson caused the end of his life, after he had valiantly raigned the space of foure yeeres: all which time, by the testimony of an old Chronicle that Fabian had seene, Vortigern the father remained in durance, and vnder assigned Keepers in the City Caerlegeon, now Chester, and so demeaned himselfe towards his sonne (then his Soueraigne) in dutifull obedience and faithfull counsell, that he wonne againe the hearts of the Britaines, and was againe re-established their King.

Vortimer made away by Rowena.

Vortimer the continuance of his raigne. Fabian. Chron. par. 5. cap. 89.

It is recorded by Ninius, that Vortimer after his last victory ouer the Saxons, caused his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Tanet, euen in the same place of that great ouerthrow, which by the said Author is called Lapis Tituli, of vs the Stoner, where for certaine it seemes hath beene an hauen. he commanded his body to be buried, to the further terror of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophey, their ſpirits might be daunted at the remembrance of their great ouerthrow. As Scipio Africanus conceited the like, who commanded his Sepulcher to be ſo ſet, that it might ouer-looke Africa, ſuppoſing that his very Tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. But how that deſire of Vortimer was performed, I finde not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuſcript I haue, that confidently affirmeth him to be buried in London: yet others from Ninius the diſciple of Eluodugus, hold the place to be Lincolne. But howſoeuer his graue is forgotten, yet let this be remembred, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that After he had vanquiſhed the Saxons (ſaith he) whoſe drift was not onely to ouer-runne the Land with violence, but alſo to erect their owne Lawes without clemencie, he reſtored the Chriſtian Religion then ſorely decayed, and new built the Churches that thoſe enemies had deſtroyed.

Vortimer ſuppoſed to be buryed in London.

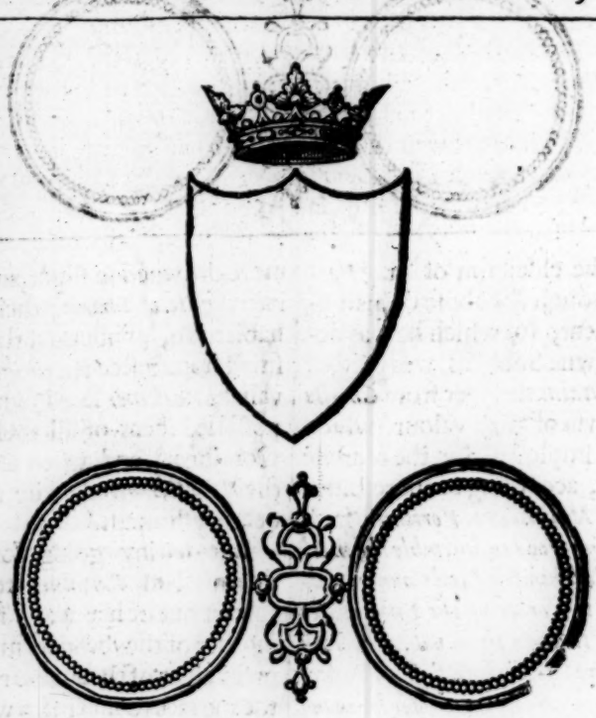
AVRELIVS AMBROSIVS. 3.



3. An. Do. 466 The third reſiſter of the Saxons.

Galfrid Mon.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 1 cap. 16

Aurelius Ambroſius, verily deſcended of that Conſtantine who in the fourth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius the younger, was elected here in Britaine, only in hope of his luckie name, ſucceeded Vortigern the Father in the Gouernment of Britaine, and Vortimer the ſonne, in affection and defence of his Country. He with Vter (ſaith Geffrey Monmouth) when their brother Conſtantine was murthered by Vortigern, fled into France, where they remained the yeers of his firſt raigne, whoſe returne (as we haue heard from Ninius) he greatly feared, and whoſe force at the laſt he felt to his ſmart. For hauing againe reſumed his Crowne, he liued in his old ſinnes, & ſuffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land: to preuent which (ſaith Beda from Gyldas) the Britaines by little and little beganne to take ſtrength, and with ſome courage to come forth of their Caues, who with one vniforme conſent, called to God for his heauenly helpe. They had (ſaith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambroſius Aurelianus, a gentle natured man, which onely of all the blood of the Romanes remained then aliue, his parents being ſlaine, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, prouoked the Victors to the fight, and through Gods aſſiſtance atchieued the Victory. From that day forward, now the Britaines, now the Saxons did preuaile, vntill the yeere that Bathe was beſieged, which was fortie foure yeeres after their firſt comming into the Iland.

His firſt Expedition (as our Britiſh Hiſtorians report) was againſt Vortigern, and his Caſtle in Wales, wherein that inceincestuous King was consumed to ashes by lightning from heauen, as we haue said: and then following the Saxons, made toward Yorke, & at Maesbel beyond Humber, encountring Hengist, became his Victor: vnto whose mercy (say they) his sonne Occa yeelded himselfe, and obtained in free gift the Country Galloway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But these his affayres thus prospering against the common Enemy, was enuied at by Pascentius, the youngest son of King Vortigern, who not able either to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recouer the Kingdome to himselfe, ambitiously sought to preferre his base humor before the recouery of his Countries libertie, which then lay gored in her owne bloud. For hauing gotten the ayd of Gillamare King of Ireland, whither he had fled vpon the death of his Father, and now returned into the west of Wales, first indammaged the Citie of S. Dauids, and thence proceeded with fire and sword. Aurelius then sicke in the Citie of Wincheſter, sent his brother Vter to withstand his force, who slew both Pascentius and the Irish King his partaker, in a set and sore battle fought betwixt them. But before this battle, Pascentius had sent a Saxon, whose name was Eopa, in shew a Britaine, and in habit a Physitian, to minister poyson in stead of physicke, which accordingly was effected with Ambrosius his death.

Hector Boetius.

Aurelius Ambrosius erected Stonhenge.

Vnto this Aurelius Ambrosius is ascribed the erection of that rare and admirable monument, now called Stonhenge, in the same place where the Britaines had beene trecherously slaughtered and interred, whose manner and forme in our draught of Wilt shire wee haue inserted. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bignesse, so that some of them containe twelue tunne in waight, and twentie eight foote or more in length, their breadth seuen, and compasse sixteene. These are set in the ground of a good depth; and stand in a round circle by two and two, hauing a third stone somewhat of lesse quantity laid gate-wise ouerthwart on their toppes, fastned with tenons and mortaises, the one into the other; which to some seeme so dangerous, as they may not safely be passed vnder, the rather for that many of them are fallen downe, and the rest suspected of no sure foundation: notwithstanding, at my being there, I neither saw cause of such feare, nor vncertaintie in accounting of their numbers; as is said to be. The stones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are beaten euen by force of weather, that serue for Rauens and other birds to build in, and bring forth their young. The ground-plot containeth about three hundred foot in compasse, in forme almost round, or rather like vnto a Horse-shooe, with an entrance in vpon the East-side. Three rowes of stones seeme formerly to haue beene pitched, the largest outwards, and the least inwards; many whereof are now fallen downe: but those that stand, shew so faire an aspect, and that so farre off, that they seeme to the beholders to be some Fortresse or strong Castle. A Trench also is about them, which hath beene much deeper: and vpon the Plaines adioyning, many round copped hilles without any such trench (as it were cast vp out of the earth) stand like great Hay-cockes in a Plaine Meadow. In these, and thereabouts, by digging haue beene found peeces of ancient fashioned armour, with the bones of men, whose bodies were thus couered with earth that was brought thither by their well-willers and friends, euen in their head-peeces; a token of loue that then was vsed, as some imagine.

The description of the Monument of Stonhenge.

Ancient fashioned Armour found at Stonhenge.

This Trophey, Aurelius Ambrosius (in memoriall of the Britaines massacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the Wonders of this Iland, and are in the verses of Alexander Necham called The Giants Dance; wherein this Ambrosius was interred after he had raigned thirtie two yeeres, and whereof the Towne Ambresbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britaines erected this most stately Sepulcher ouer the body of Ambrosius there slaine by the sword of his enemies; that his Countries loue, in such a costly peece of worke, might remaine vnto posteritie in this, the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus saith, that this man, in succouring his decayed Countrie, tooke vpon him the Imperiall Robe, and against the violent rage of those German enemies, oft times ouerthrew their puissant armies, but was lastly slaine by them vpon the Plaines of Salesbury. I cannot with silence let passe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, vnder the conduct of Vter the brother of Ambrosius, vnto this Plaine, by the industrious meanes of Merlin, surnamed Ambroſe, borne in the ancient City Merdhyn, and as Humfrey Lhuyd saith, of a noble virgin, whose father for for his skill in the Mathematicks, and wonderfull knowledge in all other kinde of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the ſon of an Incubus, or a male Deuill, which in the ſimilitude and likeneſſe of men doe vſe carnally to company with women. But how this may agree with his diuine mouth, who tels vs that Spirits haue neither fleſh nor bones; and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceiued & borne; I leaue for others further to diſpute. Only I know, that ſuch begettings as Merlines is reported to be, without father, and Simon Magus alſo, that before him would needs be the ſon of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Chriſtian Profeſſion, who acknowledge onely the conception of Chriſt, to be conceiued without the ſeed of man, or of ſinne. But to our purpoſe: Ambroſius Aurelius (by Panuinius accounted the laſt Emperor of the Britiſh bloud) is ſaid to raigne in Britaine thirtie two yeeres, and to die in that of Chriſts Incarnation 497.

VTer, ſurnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambroſius, ſucceeded him both in valour, & in the Gouernment of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles againſt the Saxons, who vnder the leading of Eske and Octa, the ſonnes of King Hengiſt, had paſſed with ſpoile to the City Yorke, whither this new-made General preſently repaired; and giuing them battell, with the diſcomfiture of their whole Army, tooke both the brethren priſoners, and committed them to ſafe cuſtody.

Vter Pendragon.

But the Britaines (ſaith Boetius) becomming diſloyall to their Prince, ſeldome aſſiſted him with preuenting counſell: and the Prince enamored vpon the Duke of Cornwals Wife, conſulted more with Merline to transforme himſelfe from himſelfe, then to giue direction againſt the common enemy. For, comming to Tindagell Caſtle in Cornwall, poſſeſſed by Gorlois, Duke of that Prouince, beheld (in his eye) the paragon of Nature, which was Lady Igren, his Dutches and wife. Vter, whoſe thoughts till then had bin free, and from his childhood had euer followed Mars in the field, was now ſurpriſed ſo farre with her loue, that his Shield and Armes were both neglected & vnworne, and all his thoughts ſet on worke to purchaſe his moſt wiſhed deſire; which laſtly, by Merline and Magicke was effected, and that after this manner (if we will beleeue him of Monmouth, who is the reporter.) His ſuites and hopes failing (ſaith he) to win her vnto diſhonour, Merline altogether new-moulded the ſhape of King Vter, and printed in his face the feature ture of Gorlois her owne Lord, by which meanes, and without ſuſpect the King diſhonourably violated this Ladies chaſtitie, in which bed of deceit, the famous Arthur was begot. The captiue Captaines Eske and Octa in theſe looſe times of his loue, gat looſe from their Keepers, and with their ratling armour rouſed Vter from this wanton Lullaby: who with troopes of ſtrength, and trumpets of defiance, met theſe Saxons face to face in the field, where betwixt them was fought a moſt bloudy battell, and that euen almoſt to the laſt ſtroke; and wherein, if fatall deſtinie had withdrawne her hand, the Iland had been rid of theſe Intruders for euer. For therein (ſay our Authours) the Saxons periſhed by the Britaines ſwords; vpon whoſe points alſo Eske and Octa paid their eſcapes with the loſſe of their liues. This field was at Verolam, whither Vter ſicke, and in his Horſe-litter, was borne among his Army, and after long and ſore ſiege, wonne from them that Citie. Pendragon the continuance of his raigne.

Of his ſurname Pendragon, theſe ſuppoſals are made. At his natiuity (ſay ſome) appeared a fiery Comet, in ſome part reſembling a Dragons Head: wherupon that great reputed Prophet Merline, attributed this heauẽly Meteor vnto this Princely new-borne Babe, and gaue him the name of Vter-Pendragon. Others for his ſerpentine wiſedome, deriue the ſurname of this Serpents Head, who like vnto that of Dan bit the Horſe heeles, ſo that the riders fell backward. For, in all his warres againſt the Saxons, he was moſt fortunate and victorious, with their great ouerthrowes. But others will haue him ſo named from his Royall Banner, borne euer before him, wherein was portraied a Dragon with a Golden Head; of which Standard ſince, neighbour Nations haue had good experience, & in far Countries it hath bin diſplayed in the cauſe of Chriſtianitie, to the terrour of the Pagans, as in Syria by ỳ inuincible Engliſh King, Richard the firſt, ſurnamed Cur-de-lion; in Scotland & Wales by that cõquering Prince Edward the firſt, and the ſame as yet is in field born for an Imperiall Standard in our Engliſh Campes.

KING ARTHVR 5.

eighteene. His prosperous entrance was enuied at by Lotha King of the Picts, and by Gouran king of the Scots, who had married his owne Aunts, Anne and Alda, the two sisters of Ambrose and Vter, each of them expecting the Crowne before him, through the opinion & repute of his bastardy; especially Lotho, who had issue by Anna, Mordrad, and Gawan: the latter of which spent his life in the cause of that quarrell. His first proceedings were against the common enemie the Saxons, whose Captaine Colgerne, he chased from Northumberland into Yorke, which Citie likewise he girt with a strait siege, notwithstanding Colgern thence escaped into Germany, and of King Cherdike got succour for his Saxons, who with seuen hundred sayle arriued in Scotland. Arthur aduertised of his great power, raised his siege, and drew towards London, & thence sent for ayde to his Nephew Howell, King of Little Britain in France, who came himselfe in person to ioyne with his Vncle.

Matth. Westm.

These from South-hampton marched to Lincolne, which City Cherdik had strongly besieged, but was thence forced by Arthurs conquering sword. Twelue Battles he fought against these Saxons (as Ninius recordeth) with great manhood and victory. The first was at the mouth of the Riuer Gleyne: the second, third, fourth, & fifth, vpon the bankes of Douglasse, in the County of Lineux: the sixth vpon the Riuer Bassus; the seuenth in the wood Calidon; the eighth neere to the Castle Guynien; the ninth in Wales, at the Towne Cairlion; the tenth at Trachenrith, or Rithowde vpon the Sea-side: the eleuenth vpon a hill named Agned Cathergonien; and the twelfth at Bathe, or Bathen-hill, where the Britaines (as Beda saith) gaue the Saxons a very great ouerthrow; which (by Gyldas report) happened fortie foure yeeres after the Saxons first arriuage into Britaine, the yeere wherein himselfe was borne.

Of Arthurs successe both at home and abroad, his great magnificence in Court and Country, his Banners, and foure Golden Swords born before him, his Round Tables, and challenges of Martiall Honour, let Monmouth the Writer, Newbery the Resister, and Leiland the Maintainer, be heard for me. But certaine it is (by the report of Malmesbury) that Arthur was a Prince more worthy to be aduanced by the truth of record in warrantable credit, then by fables scandalized with poeticall fictions and hyperbolicall falshoods. Whose Banner was so often spread for the cause of Christianitie, and defence of his Country, being the onely prop that vpheld the same. And lamentable it is, that the fame of this puissant Prince had not beene sounded by a more certaine Trumpet: for to say the truth of his Writer euen in a word, he was well skilled in Antiquities of tradition; but as it seemeth, nor any of ancient credit, so many toyes and tales he euery where interlaceth out of his owne braine, wherewith he was charged while himselfe liued, insomuch as he is now ranged among those Writers whom the Roman Church hath censured to be forbidden.

Monmouth. Will. Newb. Leiland.

Will. Malmesb

Of Iefrey of Arthur, or Monke of Monmouth.

This hurt therefore those ouer-zealous Monkes haue done to the Subiect whereof they wrote, that through an ouermuch conceited opinion, with the vertue and fame of the person, they haue mingled such matters as may iustly be reiected, whereby their worths are not onely depriued of their truly-deserued honours, but which more is, euen their persons suspected to be nought else but fictions, as Hercules in Ouid, or Hector in Homer. And so hath Geffrey done by this most worthy Prince Arthur, whose warres against the Saxons for defence of this Iland, he hath enlarged with the Conquests of other Kingdomes and Countries, wherein he neuer came: which hath made not onely his Acts to be doubted of, but euen his person to be called in question, whether any such Arthur euer ruled in Britain. Yet with better regard to the Recorders of his spreading fame, we grant both the man, & many honourable parts in him, though not in the like manner as they haue laid them downe: Neither are wee strayed so farre from the steps of credulitie, that we can beleeue no more then we see; or that seeing, be fore-stalled with a preiudicate opinion: for though we consent not to the fables of Homer, neither to the inuentions that Euripides & Sophocles made vpon the Battles of Troy, yet we deny not but that there were Warres & Battles at Troy, wherein many martiall acts vndoubtedly were performed: neither doubt we of his person, as Seneca seemeth to doe of Iupiters, but acknowledge it with reuerence for truth, yet with this reseruation, that all is not Gospell which is written in Greeke. And had there not been a truth of things wherupon Poets made their fables, there had been at this day no fables of Poets in the world. And as Geffrey wondreth, that neither Gyldas nor Beda doe mention Arthur nor his great deeds, so, saith Ranulphus phus, may we at Geffry, that hath augmented thē aboue the pitch of credulity. But for ỳ truth of this Prince, besides a Charter exemplified vnder the seale of King Edward the third wherin mention is made of King Arthur, to haue bin a great Benefactor to the Abbey of Glastenbury, who as Io. Ronse reporteth, had giuen Bren-March and other Demaines, to the value of fiue hundred Markes yeerely, to the said Monastery. His Armes (being an Escocheon, wheron a crosse with the Virgin Mary bearing Christ in her armes) cut in stone, and standing ouer the first gate of entrance as yet, is said to be the Armes of that Abbey. And Ioseph, the judicious Monke of Excester, who followed King Richard the first in his warre for the Conquest of the Holy Land, in his Poeticall verses extolleth Arthur with Alexander, Cæsar, and Hercules; yea and Ninius, farre his ancient, calleth Arthur an Iron Mall, that both bruised and brake the Lyons iawes asunder.

Therefore of his person wee make no doubt, though his acts haue bin written with too lauish a pen: neither consent we with those Historians that naturalize him for a Britaine, seeing that Ninius, Beda, Malmesbury, and himselfe seeme to speake the contrary: for Ambrosius being the brother of Vter Pendragō, as we already from Beda haue shewed, was a Captain descended from the bloud of the Romans, whose parents saith Ninius, had worn the Purple Robe, and both of them the sonnes of Constantine, whose father in Britaine against Honorius the Emperour had put on the said Robe. And by his natural descēt from the Romans, Arthur not only denied them Tribute, but also threatned to haue a Tribute from Rome: for in his Letters to that end sent vnto the Senate, thus in an old Manuscript we find it indited: Vnderstand among you of Rome, that I am King Arthur of Britaine, and freely it hold and shall hold; and at Rome hastily will I be, not to giue you truage, but to haue truage of you: for Constantine that was Helens sonne, and other of mine Ancestors, conquered Rome, and thereof were Emperours, and that they had and held I shall haue yourz Goddis grace. Whereby is manifest his bloud was from the Romans, Let not therfore any of our Britaines take exceptions against me for this, neither that I enlarge not his fame, by the enlargement of his Empire in Russia, Lapland, & in making Norway his Chamber of Britaine, as if that Kingdome and Title should be giuen him by ỳ Pope, that indeed cuts large thongs out of other mens Leather: his cōquests of thirty kingdomes, and killing of Denabus the huge Spanish Giant, and his combat with Frolo, Gouernor of France, & with Lucius Hiberus the Roman Legate, whose slaine body he sent to the Senate for the tribute of Britaine by them demāded: seing that others before me, far more ripe Historians, haue made both doubts and obiections against them. And therefore I conclude with this Arthur, as Saint Augustine with the Athenians, Whose men (saith he) were euer greater in fame then in deeds. And with Ninius will end with his saying; Arthurus pugnabat contra illos in diebus illis, & licet multi ipso nobiliores essent, ipse tamen duodecies Dux belli fuit, Victorq; bellorum: Arthur made warre against them in those dayes, & though many were more noble then he, yet was he twelue times Generall in the field, and returned Conquerour But more constant is the memory of his death, and place of his burial, both which are reported vpon warrantable credit: for Mordred the sonne of Lotho, whereof we haue spoken, affecting the Crown, vpon a pretence of right from King Vter, and supposed bastardise of Arthur, gaue many attempts, through the ayd of his Picts, & assistance of the Saxons, to dispossesse him of that wherein he was seated: and lastly at* Kambulan or Cambula in Cornwall (saith Leilād) this British Hector encoūtring Mordred, slew him out-right, and receiued of him his owne deaths wounds. The witnesse of this Field as yet are those peeces of Armour, horseharnesse, & other habiliments of Warre, which are daily digged vp in tillage of the ground; vnlesse those reliques of battle be the seales of that fight which Marianus writeth to haue beene in this place betwixt the Britaines & Saxons, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and twentie.

But from this place he was carried vnto Glastenbury in Somersetshire, where he died the one and twentith of May, in the yeere of our Saluation fiue hundred forty and two, after he had most victoriously raigned twenty sixe yeeres. His body was there buried, and sixe hundred yeeres after was taken vp, and found vpon this occasion: When Henry the second, & first Plantagenet, had swayed the English Scepter to the last of his raigne, it chanced him at Penbrooke to heare sung to

And digging nine foot deeper, his body was found in the trunke of a Tree, the bones of great bigneſſe, and in his ſcull perceiued ten wounds, the laſt very great, and plainly ſeene. His Queene Guenever, that had beene neere kinſwoman to Cador Duke of Cornwall, a Lady of paſſing beautie, lay likewiſe by him, whoſe treſſes of haire finely platted, and in colour like the gold, ſeemed perfect and whole vntill it was touched, but then (bewraying what all beauties are) ſhewed it ſelfe to be duſt. Giraldus Cambrenſis, a worthy Authour and an eye-witnes, is the reporter of this finding of Arthurs bones. And the Croſſe of Lead, with the Inſcription, as it was found and taken off the ſtone, was kept in the Treaſury or Reueſter of Glaſtenbury Church, ſaith Stowe, till the ſuppreſſion thereof in the raigne of King Henry the eight, whoſe forme and rude Letters we haue here expreſſed to thy ſight.

CONSTANTINE. 6.

Brute Booke.

Constantine the sonne of Cador Duke of Cornwall, and cosin to King Arthur by his alliance in mariage, at his death was appointed by him to succeede in his Dominions, & most ioyfully receiued of the Commons, as the man, in the opinion of this worthy Elector and themselues, accounted most fit to defend the Land from the many oppressions of the Saxons, who now began to spread the wing as farre as to Tyne in the North, and to set downe the limits of their seuerall Kingdomes; which notwithstading, these strangers daily enlarged vpon the home-bred Inhabitants, the ciuill warres of the Britaines giuing way to the same, and that not onely among themselues, but by the Picts also, in the behalfe of the two sons of Mordred, that sought to dispossesse him of his Crown. In which quarrel many battles were fought, but with such successe to the attemptors, that these two Competitors were forced for refuge into London and Winchester, where taking Sanctuary in those Churches, neere vnto the Altar Constantine slew them: for which deede, the Priest Gyldas, that flourished in those dayes, in his Inuectiue reprehensions, thus writeth: Britaine hath Kings, but they are Tyrants: Iudges it hath, but they are wicked, pilling and harming the innocent people; reuenging and defending, but whom? Such as be guiltie & robbers. They haue many wiues, yet breake they wedlocke; many times sweare, yet periure themselues; vowing, but for the most part with dissembling lies; warring, but still maintaining vniust & ciuill broyles; abroad pursuing theeues, and yet at home cherish them, euen at their owne Tables, and some times also reward them. They giue large almes indeed, yet heape they vp sinnes high as the Mountaine. They sit in the Seat of sentence, yet seldom seeke the rule of right iudgment, despising the humble and innocent persons, and extolling vp to Heauen proud and bloody Murtherers, Theeues, and Adulterers, yea, and if he would permit them, the very enemies of God. Many they keepe in prison, and load them with irons, more to serue their owne purposes, then for any guilt in the person, taking solemne Oaths before and vpon the Altars, and yet despise they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but filthy stones.

Gyldas. Abor succeff.

In his Booke De excidio Britan. Hinn. Lloyd. Bre. Brit.

Of this hainous and wicked offence Constantine the tyrannicall whelpe of the Lyonesse of Denon-shire is not ignorant, who this yere, after the receiuing of his dreadful Oath, wherby he bound himselfe, that in no wise he should hurt his Subiects, (God first, & then his oath, with the company of Saints, and his owne mother being present) did notwithstanding in the reuerend laps of both his Mothers, the church, and her by nature, and that vnder the vesture of an holy Abbat, deuoure with sword and speare, in stead of teeth, the tender sides and the entrailes of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewise of their two Gouernours, yea, and that (as I said) before the sacred Altars; the Armes of which persons so slaine, not stretched forth to defend themselues with weapons (which few in those daies handled more valiatly then they) but stretched forth to God, and to his Altar, vntil the day of Iudgement shall set vp the reuerend ensignes of their patience and faith at the Gates of the City of Christ, which so haue couered the seate of the Celestiall Sacrifice, as it were with the red Mantle of their cluttered bloud.

These things he did not after any good deedes done by him deseruing prayse: for many yeeres before ouercome with the often and changeable filths of Adultery, and forsaking his lawfull wife (contrary to the Law of God) being not loosed from the snares of his former sinnes, he increaseth the new with the old. Thus farre Gyldas, for this time, and for the raigne of Constantine; whose life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Conanus, when he had raigned fully three yeeres, and without issue was buryed at Stonhenge. Constantines raignes continuance.

Aurelius Conanus, the Nephew of King Arthur, after he had slaine his cosen Constantine in battell, was made King ouer the Britaines, in the yeere after Christs Natiuity fiue hundred forty fiue. He was of disposition free and liberall, but therewithall of a light credit, and very suspicious, cherishing them that accused others, without respect of right or wrong, putting some to death, and retaining others in perpetuall prison, among whom his owne vncle was one, whose two sons he caused to be slaine, no causes obiected, but that these three were in truth betwixt him & the Crowne: for which, and other the like impious parts the said Gyldas cõtinueth the tenor of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lyons whelpe (as speakes the Prophet) Aurelius Conanus, what dost thou? art thou not swallowed vp in the filthy mire of murthering thy Kinsmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waues and surges of the drenching Seas, ouerwhelming thee with her vnmercifull rage? Dost thou not in hating the peace of thy Country, as a deadly Serpent, and thirsting after ciuill warres & spoiles (oftentimes vniustly gotten) shut vp against thy soule the Gates of celestiall peace? Thou being left alone as a withering tree in the middle of a field, cal to remẽbrance (I pray thee) the vaine youthfull fantasie, and ouer-timely deaths of thy Fathers & thy Brethren: shalt thou being set apart, and chosen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deserts, be

The raigne of this King, among the vncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Hiſtorians, as vncertainly. For ſome hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the iuſt reuenging hand of God for his ſinnes: others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they ſay, moſt viciouſly he liued, and yet Matthew of Weſtminſter will haue him continue in gouernement no leſſe then thirtie yeeres; and Iohn Stowe addeth three more: ſuch extreames are wee driuen vnto, that haue our relations onely from them.

8. An. Do. 578

VOrtiporus, after the death of Aurelius, ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of the Britains, which then was much ſcantled by the intruſiõs of the Saxons, whom in many Battles (as ſay the Britiſh Hiſtorians) he vanquiſhed, and valiantly defended his Land and Subiects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithſtanding theſe reported actions thus honourably atchieued, yea and his Parentage with ſucceſſion of gouernment, may be both ſuſpected and iuſtly called in queſtion, as by the words of Gildas is manifeſt; who ſuffered not this King alſo to paſſe vntouched in his Inuectiue and lamentable paſſions. And thou (ſaith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickednesse, diuerſly ſpotted, as it were with many colours, with thy hoary head in the Throne full of deceits, crafts, and wiles, and defiled euen from the loweſt part of thy body to the crowne of thy head, with diuers and ſundry murthers committed on thine owne kinne, and filthy adulteries, thus proouing the vnworthy ſonne of a good King, as Manaſſes was to Ezechias; how chanceth it that the violent ſtreames of ſinnes, which thou ſwalloweſt vp like pleaſant wine, or rather art ſwallowed vp by them, (the end of thy life by little and little now drawing neere) cannot yet ſatisfie thee? What meaneſt thou, that fornication, of all euils as it were the full heape, thine owne wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughteſt, doeſt oppreſſe thy ſoule with a certaine burthen that cannot be auoyded?

By this teſtimony of Gyldas, this Vortiporus could not be the ſonne of bad Conan, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Weſtminſter affirme him: his Father being compared to godly Ezechias King of Iudah, and himſelfe continuing his gouernment, as is ſaid, the ſpace of foure yeeres, ended his life without iſſue to ſucceed him.

MALGO CANONVS. 9.

9. An. Do. 581 Mat. Westmin.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Conanus, as some write, succeeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of a most seemely presence, but withall, charged with many vnbeseeming and foule sinnes, by ancient Gyldas, the onely recorder of the Actions in these times; who calleth him the Dragon of the Iles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in mischiefe and malice; a large giuer, but more lauish and prodigall in all sinnes and licentiousnesse: in Armes and Dominions more strong, and greater then any other British Potentate; but stronger in the destruction of his owne soule, in committing the grand abhorred sinne of Sodomie. In his youthfull dayes, with sword and fire he brought to destruction his Vncle by the Mothers side (being then King) together with many others, and after vpon a shew-seeming remorse of Conscience, vowed the profession and life of a Monke; but returned shortly after to his owne vomit, and became worse then he was before: for despising his first mariage, he became enamored vpon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was liuing; and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murthered them both. In these sinnes he continued the terme of fiue yeeres, and dying without issue, left his Crowne to another.

By these reprehensions of Gyldas, it should rather seeme that these Princes liued altogether at one & the same time, vnto whom he spake personally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if such successions and such yeeres had beene expired, as here is laid downe. And therefore not without cause some haue affirmed, that these Captaines vsurped authoritie together in diuers parts of the Iland, and not successiuely one after another, neither in deede as Kings, but rather Tyrants, polluted with these grieuous sinnes, as you haue heard, and are so termed by their owne Historian, that bringeth * one more to tyrannize, whom neither Monmouth nor he of Westminster hath spoken of, which is Cuneglasus, whom he calleth a Lyon tawney Butcher, a Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Oppressour of the Clergie, that fought against God with his many grieuous sinnes, and warred vpon man with his martiall weapons. He (saith he) did put away his lawfull wife, prouoked the godly with many iniuries, was proudly conceited of his owne wisedome, and set his whole hope in vncertaine riches. If then the head was so sicke, could the bodie be sound, that as (Beda saith) were so set to breake all orders of truth and iustice, that scant any token or remembrance thereof remained? And for witnesse against them, called their owne Historian Gyldas, that accused them of many impieties, and this not the least, that those Britaines neglected the preaching of the Gospell to the Saxons.

His firſt affaires againſt the Saxons, was to reuenge the deaths of his Britaines, and harmeleſſe Monkes of Bangor, ſlaine (as we haue ſaid) by wilde Ethelfrid, the mighty King of Northumberland. Theſe in Field had aſſembled all their powers, wherein the fatall end either of the Britains or Northumbrians muſt needs haue enſued, had not the quarrell beene ſtayed by the mediation of friends. Theſe Kings, then, and there reconciled, embraced peace, with ſuch true friendſhip, that they continued amitie together ſo long as they liued.

CAdwallo or Cadwallin, the ſonne of Cadwan, was made King ouer the Britaines, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred thirtie fiue; Hee warred moſt ſtrongly againſt the Saxons, and either by Conqueſt or Alliance joyned amitie with Penda the cruell King of the Mercians, a Pagan Idolater himſelfe, by the report of Beda, although a Chriſtian in name and profeſsion, yet in minde and manners ſo rude and outragious, that he ſpared neither womens weakneſſe nor childrens innocency, but put all to death with grieuous and bitter torments, to fulfill his cruell & vnmercifull tyranny, waſting a long time, and raging ouer the Prouinces, purpoſed to exterminate out of the borders of Britanny the whole Nation of the Engliſh, and to extinguiſh the very name of them. Neither did he ought eſteeme any reuerence or honour to the Chriſtian Religion, which thoſe men embraced: ſo that euen to this day (ſaith he) the Britaines cuſtome is to ſet light by the Faith or Religion of the Engliſhmen; neither wil they communicate with them more then with Heathens or Pagans. These two cruell Kings ſlew the moſt Chriſtian Edwyn King of Northumberland with his ſonne Prince Oſfride, in a great and bloudy battle at Hethfield, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred thirtie three: and the yeere following, with wicked force (ſaith Beda) but with worthie vengeance, Cadwallo the Britaine ſlew Oſrike and Eanfrid, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, that were become Apoſtataes from their Chriſtian Faiths, and that with cruelty and loſſe of the Saxons, as their own Hiſtorians held it fit neither to mention their names in their monethly Calender, nor regiſter the yeere wherein they were ſlaine, in account of their gouernment. but aſsigned it vnto the raigne of their Succeſſour King Oſwald, which was ſo obſerued vnto his dayes; ſo terrible was this worthy Cadwallo, and odious the remembrãce of this vnfortunate Battle. But this curſed Captaine (ſaith he) enioyed not this felicitie long: for the ſaid Oſwald, to reuenge his brothers death, came with a ſmall power, but ſtrongly fenced in the faith of Chriſt, & neer to the Riuer Deniſe gaue him battle, wherein himſelfe and late-victorious Hoſt were all ſlaine and confounded.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 1.

But we muſt remember that Beda was a Saxon; in whoſe behalfe his penne hath ſomewhat paſſed the bounds of equitie (if not verity) in charging this moſt valiant Conquerour with tyranny, and his Martiall Sword with crueltie, that was drawne & ſtrucke in defence of his natiue Country, wherin the Saxons claime ſtood onely vpon vniuſt intruſion. So likewiſe himſelfe being a Monke and Prieſt, hath euery where blamed the Britaines for diſſenting from the Roman Church, in celebration of Eaſter and other Ceremonies; whereas in doctrine they were as ſincere, which is the true ſubſtance of the Goſpell. But the Britaines record that this valiant Cadwallo dyed not in Hethfeild, neither by the hand of King Oſwald, but that he raigned in great honor the ſpace of eight and fortie yeeres, and in peace dyed the 22. of Nouember, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 677. But this relation, as also that he married the sister of King Penda, as my often named Manuscript reporteth, I leaue to the best liking of my Reader.

About this time the most blasphemous doctrine of Mahomet began to infect all the Easterne World. For although himselfe liued some nine yeeres before the gouernment of this Cadwallo, yet presently after his death, his doctrine was more publikely imbraced. He was born in Arabia, of a poore and base stocke, and being fatherlesse, was sold for a bondslaue vnto an Ismaelite, whose name was Abdemonaples, a man of exceeding great riches, and in great trade of Marchandizing; and Mahomet for his subtiltie in wit, was his fit instrument, & greatly in his fauour. The Master dying, left Mahomet his chiefe Factor, who hauing great riches in his keeping, married his Mistris, and so became heire of all; with whom consorted one Sergius a Monke, which for heresie was fled into Arabia, who instructed Mahomet in the heresie of the Nestorians: and now for his wealth and Magicall Arts, wherewith he bewitched the mindes of the people, assumed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to bee famously published for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confused Chaos of all the heresies that had beene before him: for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinitie; with the Manichies, he affirmed but two persons to be in the Deity; with Eunomius, he denied the equality of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macedone, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature. He borrowed of the Iewes Circumcision, of the Nicholaitans, pluralitie of wiues; and of the Gentiles, much Superstition; and more to cloake his diuelish inuented fantasies, somewhat he tooke from the veritie of the Gospell. Of these compounded, he deuised a law, & wrote this his Religion in the Booke called his Alcoran; and those his Professours hee named Saracens, from Sara the wife of Abraham. An.Do.625

He died of the falling sickneſſe, which long time he had dissembled, saying forsooth after his trances, that the Angel Gabriel had cõference with him, the brightnes of whose glory he could not behold.

CADVVALLADER. 13.

13. An.Do.685 Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as he of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom heare him speake in his Geffry Mon.

his owne words. Cadwallader (saith he) raigning victoriously the time of 12. yeeres, fell lastly into a dangerous sickenesse, with despaire of recouery, and vnable to gouerne. Much debate & strife arose among his great Lords, & others of high estate, insomuch that they warred each against others to the no smal annoyance and detriment of the whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a dearth of corne & victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefest sustenance: whose third calamitie was mortalitie and pestilence, raigning so sore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, & speaking, they were surprised with death, & in such number, that the liuing were scarce able to bury the dead; which miseries lasted no lesse then eleuen yeeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, and brought forth no fruit at all, in so much that the King & many of his Nobles were driuen to forsake their natiue Country, and to seeke reliefe in forraine parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cosen, the King of Little Britain in Frãce, wher he was honourably receiued & maintained.

But now the Angell of God sheathing his sword from slaughter, and the earth answering man againe with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supply; who repleniſhed the Cities, and manured the Country, at this day called Lhyoyger, containing all the Land that lay on the East of Seuerne and Dee, dispossessing the poore Britaines of their rightfull inheritance, and diuiding their Lands vnto their owne vse. Cadwallader hearing of their daily arriuage, and their vniust intrusion vpon his home-bred Subiects, minded their redresse by his present returne, and to that end had wrought King Alan, for his succour & assistãce. But see how it chanced: he being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoise vp his sailes for Britaine, the silent night being much spent in prayer and supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affayres, behold an Angel appeared to him, or at least-wise to his seeming he heard a voyce, that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will that he should vndergoe that Voyage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrari-wise bade hie him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receiue the habit of Religion, wherein he should dye, and rest in peace.

D. Powel. Chron. of Wales.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told vnto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shaftesbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ (if we doe beleeue these to be true) wherein it was propheciedforsooth, that the Britaines should lose their Kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, vntill the time that ỹ bones of Cadwallader should be brought from Rome. By such toyes and illusions in those dayes of darknes, the euer-erring mindes of men were content to be led; for not onely Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came vnto him by a diuine prouidence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gaue ouer his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subiects to be ouer-run by strangers, and the Land to be enioyed by a forrain Nation: and receiuing the habit of seeming Religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died soone after in the yeere of our Lord 689. and there was buryed in S. Peters Church, being the last King of the Britaines bloud, that had held possession thereof the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres before the Natiuitie of Christ, and six hundred eighty-eight yeeres after his Birth, as the Chronicler of Wales, with other Britaine Writers, haue calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size. But howsoeuer this sudden alteratiõ was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a King in health, he raigned (saith Geffry) in great magnanimitie, the terme of three yeeres, and fought many Battles against the Saxons, whose sword was euer sheathed with Victory; for Lothaire King of Kent he slew in the Field, and Edilwach also King of the South-Saxons, with the ruine of his Country, as the British Historians report, and would haue it.

Cadwallader the continuance of his raigne.

But Beda, vnto whom more credit is herein to be giuen, tels vs, that Lothaire was slaine by Edrik, his Nephew & Successour, declaring the manner and day of his death; and that Ceadwall, a young man of the West-Saxons bloud royall, being banished from among them, fell vpon the South-Saxons, harrying the Country and killing their King. But afterwards lamenting the bloud he had spilt, whereat euen Nature her selfe seemed to be offended, in great repentance abandoned his his Kingdome, & pilgrim-like went vnto Rome, whereof Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Eaſter Euen, the yeere from Chriſts Natiuitie 689. The times thus agreeing, their names ſo neere, their deuotions alike, Sergius the ſame ghoſtly father to both, their ſepulchers in one and the ſame Church, doe ſtrongly confirme that they both were the ſame and one only man, as wee formerly haue ſaid. But with this man Cadwallader, whereſoeuer he died, lay buryed the laſt bloud of their Kings, their gouernment, and immediatly the very name of Britaine, for many hundred yeeres enſuing, as in the ſequell of this Hiſtory (Chriſt aſſiſting) ſhall be ſhewed.

And now at laſt, according to my firſt intendment, I am come to ſpeake of the ſucceſſion of Great Britaines Monarkes, from which (vpon the fore-ſhewed occaſions of the Ilands diuiſion, the Saxons poſſeſſions, and theſe Britaine Reſiſters) I haue beene ouer-long ſtayed, and am forced to returne againe to King Hengiſt, the firſt of the Saxons, that I may ſhew their ſucceeding ſucceſſion in this Engliſh Monarchy; wherein of neceſsitie I muſt deſire the patience of my Reader, if ſome things be againe touched that formerly haue beene ſpoken, the Matter of Hiſtory ſo much requiring, and the Method that to my proceeding I haue propoſed, enforcing it.

THE SAXONS SVCCESSIONS IN THE MONARCHY OF GREAT BRITAINE, WHEREOF HENGIST THE FIRST KING OF KENT BECAME THE First Monarch of the Engliſh-men.

Saxon Monarchs.

CHAPTER XIII.

An. Do. 450 Beda. Malmesb.

Hengiſt, a Prince of the Engliſh-Saxons, hauing the cõmand ouer certaine Forces planted in the Low-Countries of Germany, in the yere of Chriſts Incarnation foure hundred and fifty, tranſported them ouer into Britaine, where the fifth yeere after his arriuall, he began his kingdome in Kent; and hauing ſurpriſed his ſonne in law King Vortigern, ſlain his Britaines, and ſeized into his poſſeſſion the beſt of the Iland, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, & deſerueth to be reputed the firſt Monarch of the Engliſh Nation.

(2) He (as all the Saxon Kings beſides) doth claime his originall from Prince Woden, and his wife Fria, by Wechta the eldeſt of their ſeuen ſonnes, being the fifth in iſſue from them, as thus: Himſelfe was the ſonne of Withgils, who was the ſonne of Witha, and he the ſonne of Wechta *Floren. This Prince held the ſupreme Scepter of this Iland for thirty foure yeeres continuance, and therein dyed honorably, ſaith Marianus Scotus. But Peter de Ikham, Polydore, and others ſay that he was ſlaine in battell, or elſe taken by Edol, Earle of Glocester, and beheaded at Conesborow.

He left iſſue behind him two ſons and one daughter, whoſe names were Hatwaker, Eske, and Rowena.

Petrus Albinus

(3) Hatwaker his eldeſt ſonne, is reported by Petrus Albinus of Wittenberge, (a great Genealogiſt and Hiſtorigrapher alſo) to be Duke of the Saxons in Germany, and there left to gouerne the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Albinus authority be ſufficient, he was the Father of Duke Hatwegat, and grandfather of Hilderik King of the Saxons, anceſtor to the valiant Witikindus, the principall progenitor of the moſt noble Family of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Eske the ſecond ſonne of King Hengiſt, came ouer with his Father into Britaine, and was his aſſiſtant in all his wars, wherein he gaue worthy teſtimony of his valour: whoſe Kingdome of Kent after his death he enioyed, and gaue name to that Countries Inhabitants, who were from him called Eskings, ouer whom he raigned peaceably twenty yeeres.

Beda hiſt. lib. 2. cap 5. Eske how loug he raigned.

(5) Rowena, the daughter of King Hengiſt, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards ſent for by him into Britaine, to further his deſignes. At whoſe ſurpaſſing beauty and feature Vortigern ſo viciouſly gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and louing wife, to inioy the pleaſures of her Paganiſh bed, and to the great decay of Chriſtianity and griefe of the Nobility, ſhee became the kings ſecond wife, and the principal cauſe of the Lands deſtruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewiſe his third wife; by whom he had iſſue Fauſtus, that as vertuouſly ſpent the dayes of his life, as hee was inceſtuouſly begot in that wicked bed.

This Rowena, whom ſome cal Ronixa, by Vlitarpius is accounted the Neece, & not the daughter of Hengiſt. But ſeeing his opinion is grounded vpon the youth of Hengiſt, as not ſufficient in yeers to haue a daughter ſo mariageable, I rather think & hold his bare teſtimony vnable to turne the great ſtreame of other Writers out of their vſuall courſe & receiued chanell.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOVTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Ella Monar.

CHAPTER XIV.

An.D.581. Beda hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 5.

ELla a noble Saxon, being ſent for by King Hengiſt, about the three and twentieth yeer of his raigne, brought a freſh ſupply of thoſe Germans to the reliefe of his Countrimen, who with his forces landed at the hauen now called Shoreham in Suſſex, where putting backe the Inhabitants in many skirmiſhes, laſtly chaſed thē into a great wood then called Andred-flege; whence often being aſſayled by the ſudden aſſaults of the Britaines, (wherein as may be thought, he loſt the liues of his two elder ſonnes) was ſo hardly beſet, that he ſent for more ayde of his Saxons, who came to his ſupply.

Matt. Weſtmin.

(2) His ſtrength thus augmented, and ambition ſtill encreaſed, he fought three cruell and bloudy battels, but the laſt of them moſt fatall againſt the Britaines, in the place then called Macrodeſbourne, and beſieging the ancient and famous City Andred-Cheſter (ſituated in the ſayd great foreſt, and chiefe defencible fortreſſe in all thoſe Southerne parts) intercepted the Britaines that came to their reliefe, and entring the ſame by an aſſault put to the ſword al that were found within it. After which great loſſe, the Britaines ſought rather to prouid for their owne ſafety by flying into deſert places, then by making open reſiſtance to procure their own too apparent deſtruction.

Henr. Hunting.

(3) Ella in this ſtate continued the time of fiue yeers before he aſſumed the name of King, or the limits of that Prouince aſſigned vnder his gouernment: but then without any ſhew of reſiſtance, layd the foundation of this Kingdome which was the ſecond of the Saxons, and as Hengiſt held Kent, ſo he had Suſſex and Surrey for his Poſſeſſion. wherein for ſix yeeres ſpace with Hengiſt, hee liued, with ſuch approbation of valour as that, after his death he became the ſecond Saxon Monarch of the Engliſh-men, in the yeere of grace 488.

This Prince came to his graue before his Father, either by the ſtroke of warres, or by the courſe of nature, without further mention of his acts, and his ſucceſſion, cut off by his death.

Wil. Malmsb.

Flor. Wigorn.

(6) Plenching his ſecond ſonne, was borne vnto him in the Low Countries of Germanie, and with his brethren aſſiſted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by vntimely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, it is vncertaine.

(7) The youngeſt ſonne of King Ella, was Ciſſa, whom death ſpared to liue a long life; but fame as ſparing to adorne it with memory of his acts: for nothing of him is left memorable, beſides the building of Chicheſter. Fortune indeed ſet his Fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the Weſt-Saxon, vnto whom Ciſſa gaue yeerely contribution, to ſecure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath bin and ſhall be ſhewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and erection of his Kingdome, for time is vncertaine; but his raigne therein, as alſo in his Monarchy, is more certainly known: for he was King of the South-Saxons the ſpace of thirty two yeeres, and Monarch of the Engliſh-men ſixe and twenty, dying in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation fiue hundred and fourteene, which was the thirty ſixth after his firſt arriuall into Britaine.

CHERDIK THE FIRST KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Cherdik.

CHAPTER XV.

THE Saxons Sunne, thus riſen and high aſcended vpon the South of Britaine, beganne now to ſpread his beames towards the Weſt; for Kent being quietly poſſeſſed by King Eske, and South-Saxia, with all the ſubdued, at the diſpoſe of great Ella; Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low Country Germans, thought himſelfe as ſufficient in warres, and as able for reach, to weare, and to weild a Crowne of Eſtate, as either of them that had ſo done before him: And ſeeing that Britain was now the ſeed-plot for Diademes, ſet his affection and preparation that way.

1 An. D. 495.

(2) He with his forces entred in the Weſt of that Iland, where hee in his firſt battell ſo danted the Inhabitants, that apparant ſignes of approching glory, were added to his aſpiring hopes: for therein he ſlew Natanleod, otherwiſe called Nazaleod, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an eaſie entrance was layd open to his deſired Empire, and a more eaſie warre left to his poſterity. This battle chanced about the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus fiue hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natanleod, (which country bare the name of the King) and neere vnto a brooke of water in the Weſt of Hampſhire, which from Cherdik began to be called Cherdiks-ford, where now a Towne of the ſame name ſtandeth, but by contraction and ſhortneſſe of ſpeech is called Chardford.

(3) Florentius of Worceſter, the Saxons Genealogiſt, (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the reſt of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (ſayth he) was the ſonne of Eliſud, and he the ſonne of Eſla, the ſonne of Geriſius, the ſonne of Wigga, the ſonne of Friairin, the ſonne of Freodegar, the ſonne of Beorn, the progenitor of Ida, the firſt King of Bernicia, and both of them the ſonnes of Brand, the ſonne of Bealedag, the fift ſonne of the foreſaid Woden.

Flor. Wigorn.

(4) In the ſeuenth yeere of Ella his Monarchy, was his arriuage, and ſix yeeres after he beganne his Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons; ſeating himſelfe and the foundation thereof betwixt the Britaines and the South-Saxons; for whoſe further ſecurity, Ciſſa King of that Prouince, gaue him an yeerely contribution towards towards the maintenance of his charge in warre, wherein hee got ſuch reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, hee aſſumed the Monarchie vnto himſelfe, and was both the firſt King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Engliſhmen, wherein he continued the ſpace of twenty one yeeres, and deceaſed in the yeere of our Lord fiue hundred thirty fiue, being the three and thirtieth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his firſt arriuall.

Cherdik, how long he raigned.

His Iſſue.

(5) His iſſue were two ſonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolfe: the one immediately, and the iſſue of the other collaterally attained to the ſame poſſeſſion and title that Cherdike here firſt layd.

(6) Chelwolfe his ſecond ſonne (for of Kenrik the eldeſt wee are hereafter to ſpeake) hath little mention made of among our writers: more then that hee was the Anceſtour of Eskwin, the eight King of the Weſt-Saxons, that is to ſay, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenſy; which Kenſy had iſſue the ſayd Eskwin, who was th ſucceſſor of King Kenwalk, and predeceſſor of King Kentwin in the Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons.

Immediately vpon the death of his Father, he ſucceeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the ſecond King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Engliſhmē, beginning his raigne ouer both at one and the ſame time, the yeere of Chriſt his Natiuity fiue hundred thirty foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines vpon the Territories of the Britains, gaue them two great ouerthrowes, the one at Searesbury in Wilt-ſhire, and the other at Banbury in Oxford ſhire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his kingdome in more quiet after. CHEVLINE THE THIRD KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XVII.

Mat. Weſtm.

Heuline, the eldeſt ſonne of King Kenricke, ſerued with great commendations vnder his Father, in all his warres againſt the Britaines, and is ſpecially mentioned at the Battle of Banburie in Oxford-ſhire; and after his Fathers death became the third KING of the Weſt-Saxons, and the fift MONARCH of the Engliſhmen. Hee much enlarged the bounds of his KINGDOME and increaſed the power and glory of the Weſt-Saxons.

Henr. Hunting.

(2) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely ſubdue the Britaines in many Battles, but alſo ſet him ſelfe againſt his owne Nation the Saxons, and ſought to impoſe the ſcope of his power vpon the South of the Riuer Thames: for entring Kent (whoſe King was then a childe, by name Ethelbert, the ſon of Imerik) at Wiphandun or Wilbandun* in Surrey, in a ſet and ſore Battle, defeated all his forces; whence the young King was chaſed, and two of his greateſt Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were ſlaine, as we haue ſayd.

* Wimbledon.

(3) Not long after this victory, he ſet his his minde to inlarge his West-Saxons Dominions vpon the poſſeſſion of the declining Britaines, and to that end furniſhed forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. Theſe marching to Bedford, gaue Battle to the Britaines, where they ſlew them downe-right; and ſurpriſed foure of their chiefeſt Townes, at that time called Liganburge, * Eglesbourgh, Benſington, and Eueſham; which they fortified, to their owne ſtrength, and the Britaines great loſſe.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about ſix yeeres after ſent forth againe his Saxons, vnder the conduct of the foreſaid Cuthwin, who encountered the Britaines at Diorth or Deorham, with ſuch valour and ſucceſſe, that beſides great ſlaughter of the Britiſh Souldiers, three of their Kings, whoſe names were, Coinmagill, Candidan, and Farimnagill, fell in the field, with the ſurprizal of theſe three Cities, Gloceſter, Bathe, and Cirenceſter. Then ſaith Gyldas) euidently appeared the Lands deſtruction, the ſins of the Britains being the only cauſe, when neither Prince nor people, Prieſt nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord, but diſobediently wandred in their owne wayes.

(5) But no greater were the ſinnes of the Britains, then the vnſatiable deſires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Cheuline about the laſt of Malgoe his gouernement met the Britaines at Fetanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out to the great ſlaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, king Cheulins ſonne: notwithſtanding the victory fell on his ſide with great ſpoiles obtained, & poſſeſſions of many Prouinces, which himſelfe no long time enioyed.

The Rudborne.

(6) For growne proud through his many proſperous victories againſt his enemies, & tyrannizing ouer his own Subiects, the West-Saxons, fell into ſuch contempt, that they ioyned with the Britains for his deſtruction. The greateſt againſt him, was diſloyall Chell or Cealrick, his nephew, the ſonnes of Cuthwin his moſt loyall brother, whom both the Nations had elected for Generall. Vnder him they muſter and march into Wiltſhire, and at Wodnesbeoth (now Wannes-ditch) pitch downe their Standards. Cheuline that thought hee led fortune in a leafe, with confident boldneſſe built his preſent proceedings vpon his former ſucceſſe, and in the face of his enemies diſplaied his colours. But the Battels ioyned, and the Field goared with bloud, the day was loſt vpon the kings ſide, and he in diſtreſſe ſaued himſelfe by flight. Here might you haue ſeene the world, as it is, vnconſtant and variable; for he a Mars, that had ouer-borne the Britaines in ſo many Battles, and had raiſed the Saxons vnto ſo great a height, is forced to flee before his conquered Captiues, and to exile himſelfe from the ſight of his own Subiects, after he had glorioufly raigned thirty one yeeres, or (as ſome will) thirty three, and as a meane man, dyed in his baniſhment, the yeere of grace fiue hundred ninety two.

His Iſſue.

(7) Hee had iſſue two ſonnes, which were Cuth and Cuthwin, the elder wherof had valiantly ſerued in his fathers wars, namly at Wimbledone in Surry, againſt King Ethelbert and his power of Kentiſhmen, in the yeere of Chriſt fiue hundred ſixty ſeuen; and laſtly in the Battle at Fethanleah, where the Britaines receiued a great ouerthrow. Notwithſtanding hee valiantly fighting among the thickeſt of his enemies, was there ſlaine, in the yeere of our Lord fiue hundred eighty foure, being the fiue and twentieth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and that without iſſue.

(8) Cuthwin the younger ſonne of King Cheuline, ſuruiued his Father, but ſucceeded him not, becauſe of his young yeres; or elſe (and that rather) for the hatred that his father had purchaſed of his Subiects, which they repayed him in his owne expulſion, and in this his ſonnes depriuation. But although the wreath of the West-Saxons did not adorne this Cuthwines head, yet ſhone it more bright, and ſtood with greater maieſty vpon the browes of Ina, the warlike and zealous king of West-Saxons; and of Egbert the victorious and firſt ſole abſolute Monarch of the Engliſh Empire: both of them in a right line iſſued from this Cuthwin, as in the ſeuenth Chapter we haue ſayd.

ETHELBERT THE FIFTH, AND FIRST CHRISTIAN KING OF KENT, AND THE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

An. Do. 561

THE flame of the West-Saxons for a time thus quenched, the Lampe of Kent began againe to shine, and to assume the Title of the Monarchy, after it had beene suppressed in them through the raignes of these foure last Kings: for young Egberts entrance, with the great losse of his Kentish, ouerthrown by King Cheuline, gaue rather inducemẽts to a tributary subiection, then any apparant hopes to purchase an Empire.

(2) But such is the dispose of God in his hidden councell, that things of least appearance many times become the greatest in substance, as in this Prince it was euidently seene, who making vse of his owne youth and losse got thereby experience, both to defend himselfe, and to prouoke others, with such victories abroad, repaired his losses at home, that as farre as Humber he made all subiect to Kent.

Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 26.

(3) Thus growne to be the greatest of any Saxon before him, he sought to hold it vp by forraine alliance, and to that end became suter for Berta a most vertuous Christian Lady, the daughter of Chilperik King of France; vnto whom by her father she was lastly granted, but with these conditions, that shee might reserue her Christian Profession, enioy the presence and the instuctions of Luidhard her learned Bishop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) These couenants concluded, and many French Christians attending her in his Court, by their daily seruice of God, and continual practice of piety, drew many of the English to fauour their Religiõ yea and the King also to be inclined that way. And as these were working the saluation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conuersion of the rest.

(5) It chanced great Gregory (then Arch-deacon of Rome) to see certaine youths of this Iland brought to that City, to bee sold for slaues: His Christian heart pitying at such heathenish tyrannizings, and beholding stedfastly their faces, to bee faire and Angel-like, demanded of their Merchants, from what Nation, and whence they were; who made him answer, that they were Angles, and by that name knowne in the Ile of Britaine. Indeede, sayd Gregory, & not without cause are they so named, their resemblance is so Angelicall, and fit fit it is that they bee made inheritours with the Angels in heauen. But of what Prouince in Britain are they, ſaid Gregory; of Deira, ſay they a country in the North of that cõtinent. Now ſurely, ſaid he, it is great pity but that theſe people ſhould be taken from Dei ira, the ire of God. And farther asking, what was the name of their King, it was anſwered, that he was called Ella; whereunto he alluding, ſayd, that Allelnia, to the praiſe of God, in that Princes Dominions ſhould ſhortly bee ſung.

Auſtine commeth into England.

(6) And to that purpoſe himſelfe, being afterwardes Pope, ſent Auſtine a Monke, with forty others his aſſiſtance, whereof Melitus, Iuſtus, and Iohn were chiefe. Theſe landing in Tanet, in the moneth of Iuly, about fiue hundred ninety & ſix yeeres after the incarnation of Chriſt, and one hundred forty & ſeuen after the firſt arriuage of theſe Angles into Britain, had immediately acceſſe vnto the preſence of King Ethelbert, but yet in the open Field; for he feared to conferre with them in any houſe, leſt by ſorcery (as he fondly ſurmiſed) he might be ouercome.

(7) Theſe preaching vnto him the word of life, his anſwer was, that preſently he could not conſent to their doctrine, neither raſhly forſake his ancient and accuſtomed religion. But ſeeing (ſayd he) you tell vs ſtrange things, and giue vs faire promiſes of after-life, when this life ſhall be ended, we permit you to preach the ſame to our people, and to conuert as many as you can, and we our ſelues will miniſter all things behoouefull for your liuelyhood. Which promiſe he inſtantly performed, & in Canterbury his head City, allowed them fit places for reſidence, and ſufficient prouiſion for their maintenance, wherein theſe religious men following in ſome meaſure the examples of the Apoſtles, ſpent their times in preaching and prayers, watching for the peoples conuerſion, & exerciſing the works of true piety, as examples & motiues vnto others to imbrace the Goſpell which they ſought to plant.

(8) Neere vnto the Eaſt part of the City ſtood an ancient Church, built by the Chriſtian Romans, whiles they had dwelt in Britain, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is ſo yet called. To this Church the Chriſtian Queene Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily reſorted to pray; and vnto theſe, and in this Church, Auſtine and his fellowes began daily to preach: vnto whoſe Sermons ſo many of the Kentiſh alſo reſorted, that a plentifull harueſt in ſhort time appeared, vpon the ſeed-plot of their tillage; for it is reported that ten thouſand of the Engliſh people were baptized there in one day, inſomuch that the King himſelfe forſooke his Heatheniſh Idolatry, and likewiſe receiued the Sacrament of Baptiſme, vnto his ſaluation in Chriſt: in witneſſe whereof, hee gaue the Lordſhip and Royalty of his cheife City Canterbury vnto Auguſtine and reſigned his Princely Palace therein vnto him; who in the Eaſt of this city laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the ſeruice and name of Chriſt, which at this day is the Cathedral of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to giue him more roome, withdrew himſelf vnto Reculuer in Tanet, where hee erected a Palace for himſelfe and his Succeſſours, the compaſſe wherof may be traced by an old wall, whoſe ruines remaine there yet to this day.

(9) Auſtine thus ſeated, and in the weldeſerued fauor of King Ethelbert, got one requeſt more, which was this; that whereas by the Law of the Twelue Tables it was forbidden to bury the dead within the walles of any City, (the practiſe whereof, wee daily finde by monuments taken vp in the fields adioyning) it would pleaſe him to giue to that vſe, an old Idol Temple ſtanding without the Eaſt-wall of the City; wherin the King himſelfe had wontedly worſhipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged from that profane exerciſe, to the ſeruice of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, King Ethelbert added thereunto a moſt faire Monaſtery, built vpon his own coſt, and dedicated it vnto the name of Peter & Paul the Apoſtles, appointing it to be the place for the Kentiſh Kings Sepulchers; and Auſtine, likewiſe meant it for the burials of his ſucceſſours in that See. But firſt it became the monument of his owne name: for in regard of the Procurer, both Pancras, Peter, & Paul were ſoon ſwallowed vp, and the whole called only by the name of Saint Auſtines. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and tenne of their Archbiſhops therein layd, vntill that Cuthbert the eleuenth in ſucceſſion, in fauour of Saint Iohns, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the ſon of Ercombert, that ỹ ſucceeding Archbiſhops might bee buried there. in the dayes of King Henry the eighth; whose vncouered Walles stood so long languishing in time and stormes of weather, that dayly increased the aspect of her ruines, till now lastly they are made subiect to other publike vses, and the whole tract of that most goodly foundation in the same place no where appearing. Ethelberts Tower yet standing.

(10) These his happy beginnings, Austine signified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how hee might further proceed: which questions, were they not written by the Venerable Beda, wee could hardly beleeue that such idle conceits should haue place in the minde of a man so well and fruitfully busied: as, Whether a woman with childe might receiue the Sacrament of Baptisme, or in her monethly disease, the holy Communion or enter the Church: How long after her deliuerance, the husband ought to refraine her Bed: How the Gifts that were offered on the Altar ought to be distributed: and vnto what degree of consanguinity, Christians might marrie: and many others such like as though himselfe had neuer read either Moses or Paul. But of the thing then more needefull, for that at that time it stirred most contention, it seemeth he was sufficiently instructed; neither among his other questions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Easter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romanes was such, that it caused Lord-like Austin to prophecy (if not to seeke) their destructions; and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the man of Sinne: for thus the Story is reported.

Austines questions to the Pope.

(11) Austine, by the assistance and authority of King Ethelbert, called an Assembly of the British Bishops and Doctors, that had retained the Doctrine of the Gospell amongst them, euen from the first plantation thereof by the Apostles themselues, to be holden in the Borders of the Victians and West-Saxons, and at the place vpon that occasion called * Augustines Oake: thither resorted seuen British Bishops, and many other wel-learned men (saith Beda) out of their greatest Monastery at Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbat. These men now ready to goe to the foresaid Synod, came first to a certaine holy and wise man, which liued thereabout an Anchorets life, to aske his counsell, Whether they ought at Austins preaching and exhortation, leaue their Traditions or no: The Anchoret replyed, If hee be a man of God follow him. But how shall we proue (sayd they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchoret answered, Our Lord sayth, Take yee on you my Yoke, and learne ye of me, for I am milde and humble of heart. If therefore this Austine bee milde and humble of heart, it is like that himself beareth the Yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare. But if hee bee cursi and proud, it is certaine that he is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his words. Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Austine were proud or no. Prouide (quoth he) that he and his company may come first to the place of the Synod or councell house: and if it be so that when you approch neere him, he arise courteously, and salute you, then thinke him to be the seruant of Christ, and so heare him, and obey him: but if when you approch, hee despise you, and will not vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the greater number, let him likewise be despised of you. And truly (sayth he) as this Anchoret bad them, so did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Austine was already set in his chaire, and stirred not: which when they saw, forthwith waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeuoured to ouerthwart and gainsay whatsoeuer he proposed. And so the Synod brake vp without any thing done.

* About South hampton as is thought.

Thus then we see, that the substance of doctrine was imbraced in Britaine, before the sending of Austin from Rome: only in ceremonies they dissented, as the most of Christian Churches, without derogation to the Gospell, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Easter, a matter of no great moment (if wee consider our Christian liberty and the Apostles feare, that the obseruations of dayes, moneths, times, and yeers, turne the hearts after beggerly rudiments, bring againe into bondage, & make his labours for Christ in vaine) yet for the different obseruation only of this feast from the Romans, how oft are the Britaines tearmed by Beda a wicked people, a cursed nation, and well deseruing those calamities which the Lord did inflict vpon them? This controuersie for Easters celebration thus begun, continued no lesse then ninety yeeres after, and was lastly concluded in manner as followeth.

Gal. 4. 9.

Beda hist. lib. 3. cap. 25.

(12) This variance (sayth Beda) made not onely the people to doubt and feare, lest bearing the name of Christians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apostle speaketh; but also good Oswy King of Northumberland, and learned Prince Alkfryd, with Queene Eanfled, were much distracted and perplexed: for by this variance (sayth he) it often times hapned, that in one yeer two Easters were kept; for the King breaking vp his Fast, and solemnizing of the Feast, the Queene with Prince Alkfryd, continued their Fast, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrariety, a Synod purposely was called, and the Question disputed by their best Diuines. The place was Stranshalch or Whitby, wherof Hilda was Abbesse. The chiefe parties for, and against the accustomed time of keeping that feast, were King Oswy and Prince Alkfryd his sonne. The Disputers for Oswy and the established orders, were Colman Archbishop of York, with his Scotish Clergie, and Hilda the vertuous and learned Lady Abbesse of the place. For Alkfrid & the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons, Wilfrid Abbat of Rippon, with Iames and Romanus, two learned men, and the reuerend Cedda newly consecrated Bishop, appointed Prolocutor of the Assembly.

Stranshalch Synode.

King Oswy perswadeth to vnion.

The Conuocation set, King Oswy made a solemne Oration, wherein he vrged a necessity that those people which serued one God, ought to celebrate his heauenly Sacraments alike, and should keep one order and rule in the same: the truth of which seruice, & surcease of that long vnchristian variance, for the Christian celebration and time of Easter, was then presently by those learned men to bee handled, and by best approuements to bee determined; whereunto hee requested their vttermost endeuours, and to that purpose cõmanded his Arch-bishop Colman first to speake: wherupon Colman with reuerence stood vp and said: The Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my Forefathers, of whom I was consecrated, and sent hither for your Bishop. They all (you know) were godly men, and obserued the Feast as we doe now; neither thinke you they kept this tradition without sure warrant from greater then themselues, which was Saint Iohn the Euangelist, and the Disciple whom Iesus especially loued, who in the Churches which himself planted, celebrated the Feast of Easter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man so worthy, And the manner so ancient, I hope you will all cõfesse, it is not safe for vs now to reiect it.

Colmans speech to the Synode

Wilfrid the declaimer, appointed to answer, stood vp and said: The Easter which we obserue, we our selues haue seene obserued in Rome, wher the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul lined, preached, suffered, and are buried: and in our trauels thorow France and Italy, either for study or vpon pilgrimage, we haue seene the same order kept: and we know by relation, that in Africke, Asia, Aegypt and Greece, nay thorowout al nations and tongues in the world where Christ hath his Church, that this our time and order is obserued. Shall then these obstinate Picts (I meane the Britaines) and these remote Ilands in the Ocean Sea, and yet not all of them neither fondly cõtend in this poynt against the whole world?

Wilfrides answer.

But here Colman interrupted him, and said, I much maruell, brother, that you terme our doings a fond contention, seeing we haue for our warrant so worthy an Apostle as Iohn was, who only leaned vpõ our Lords brest, and whose life and behauiour all the world acknowledgeth to be most wise and discreet.

Colmans temerity.

God forbid (said Wilfrid) that I should accuse Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moses literally, & according to the Iewish Lawes; and so the rest of the Apostles were constrained in some things to do, for the weaknes of them who accounted it a great sin to abrogate those rites that God himself had instituted; and for that cause S. Paul did circũcise Timothy, offred bloody sacrifices in the Temple, shaued his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla: vpon which considerati õ also spake Iames vnto Paul, You see brother how many thousand of the Iewes haue receiued the faith, and yet al of those are zealous followers of the law. But the light of the Gospel now shining thorow the world, it is not lawful for any Christian to be circũcised, or to offer vp bloody sacrifices of beasts. Saint Iohn therfore according to the custome of the law, in the fourteenth day of the first moneth, at euen began the celebration of Easters Festiuity, regardlesse whether it fell vpon the Sabbath day, or any other of the week. But S. Peter preaching the Gospel in Rome, remẽbring that our Lord arose from his graue the first day after the sabbath, giuing thereby vnto vs certaine assurance of our resurrection obserued the Feast of Easter according to the Commandement of that law he looked for, euen as S. Iohn did, that is to say; the first Sabbath after the full Moone of first moneth. Neither doth this new obseruation of the Gospell, and Apostles practise, breake the old Law, but rather fulfilleth it; for the Law commandeth the Feast of Pas-ouer to be kept from the fourteenth day of that moneth to the twenty & one of the same-

Exod. 12.

Ruffinus lib. 10. cap. 6.

And this hath the Nicene Councell not newly decreed, but rather confirmed (as the Ecclesiasticall History witnesseth) that this is the true obseruation of Easter, and of al Christians after this account is to be celebrated: and thereupon charged Bishop Colman, that he neither obserued it according to Iohn nor Peter.

Colman.

To this the Bishop replyed, that Anatholius for his holinesse much commended by the said Ecclesiastical History, and Columba a Father of like sanctitie, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feast according as he then did, from whose imitation he durst not digresse.

Wilfrid.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy soeuer they be (sayd Wilfrid) and what miracles soeuer they haue wrought, yet this I answer, That in the day of iudgement many shal say vnto Christ, that they haue prophecied, cast out Diuels, & wrought miracles in his name, to whom the Lord will answer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (yea and our Father, if he be the true seruant of Christ) were holy and mighty in miracles, yet can he by no meanes, be preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, vnto whom our Lord sayd, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of hel shall not preuaile against it, and to thee will I giue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen. Thus sayd, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeede spake thus vnto Peter? he answered, He did. But, can you (said he) giue euidence of so speciall authority granted to your father Columba? The Bishop sayd, No. Then (quoth the King) doe you both agree confidently, that these words were principally spoken vnto Peter, and that vnto him the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen were giuen? They all answered, It is most certaine. Wherupon the King concluded this great controuersie, and sayd, Then will I not gainsay such a Porter as this is, but as farre as I know, and am able, I will consent in all poynts to obey his ordinance, lest perhaps when I come to the doores of Heauen, I find none to open vnto me, hauing his displeasure, which is so clearely proued to beare the keyes therof.

The Synode mildly dismissed by King Oswy.

And with this so simple a collection of king Oswy, concluded this long and great contention for the celebration of Easter; which here, as borne before the time, I haue inserted, to continue the narration thereof together, and to auoyd repetition of the same things, which I seeke purposely to shunne; and so returne againe to King Ethelbert.

Redwald, the ſon of Titulus, and the third King of the Eaſt-Angles, had beene a ſubſtitute vnder Ethelbert King of Kent, and ſerued a long time as his Vice-roy ouer all his dominions, wherby he gained ſuch reputation to himſelfe, that either for his own valour, or Edbalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apoſtacy, frenſie, & inceſtuous bed) became the ſeuenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, about the yeer of Chriſt his Incarnation ſix hundred and ſixteene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne ouer the Eaſt-Angles.

(2) This Redwald (ſayth Beda) had receiued Baptiſme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perſwaſion of his wife he returned againe to his ſuperſtitious worſhips; and in one and the ſame Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, hee erected an Altar for the ſeruice of Chriſt, and another little Altar for burnt ſacrifices to his Idols, which ſtood vnto the dayes of Beda himſelfe. But as ſhe was an Inſtigator to the Eaſt-Saxons Idolatry, ſo was ſhee an inſtrument to the further ſpreading of Christianity (though not by her so purposely meant.) in sauing the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospel in all the North parts of the Saxons gouernment.

(3) For Edwin flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid was succoured and maintained in the court of King Redwald, vnto whom lastly, the Northumbriã sent both threats and rewards to haue him deliuered, or else put to death. And surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presently dyed. But she alleaging the law of humanity, the trust of a friend, and the royalty of a Prince, preuailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely saue his life, but assisted him in Battell, to the destruction of his enemy, & the gaining of Nõrthumberlands Crowne. For vpon the return of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, vnto whom Redwald yeelded not to make Edwin away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backes, and as an Enemy made towards Northumberland.

Beda hist. lib 2 cap 12.

(4) Ethelfrid, whose rage and reuenge was ready enough vpon lesser occasions, with such sudden preparations as he was able to make, met the East-Angles almost at Notingham, & that not farre from the Riuer Idle, where boldly encountring his vnequall enemy, at the first brunt slew Reynhere the sonne of king Redwald, to the great griefe of him and his whole host: whose reuenge was so violently sought, that they slew king Ethelfrid in the Field, and established Edwine to bee his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy.

Redwald his raigne.

(5) Wherein hee raigned the space of eight yeeres, and was King of the East-Angles thirty one, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord six hundred twenty foure: the eighth of Edbalds king of Kent: the thirteenth of Kingils king of the West-Saxons, and the eighth of Edwines ouer the Northumbrians.

His Wife.

(6) The Queene and wife of this King is not named by any of our Writers, but that she had bin the widdow of a Nobleman, descended of the bloud-royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserued great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had shee bin a Christian, or a fauorer of the Christians, or had not been an vtter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that proued a learned and most religious Prince, of whom wee haue spoken in Chapter eleuenth.

His Issue.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpenwald. Reynhere the elder, & Prince of the East-Angles, was slain as you haue heard, in the battell that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere vnto the Riuer Idle in Notingham-shire.

(8) Erpenwald the younger succeeded his father Redwald in the kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth king of that Nation, whose life and raigne wee haue declared in the succession of the East-Angles kings: Chapter 11.

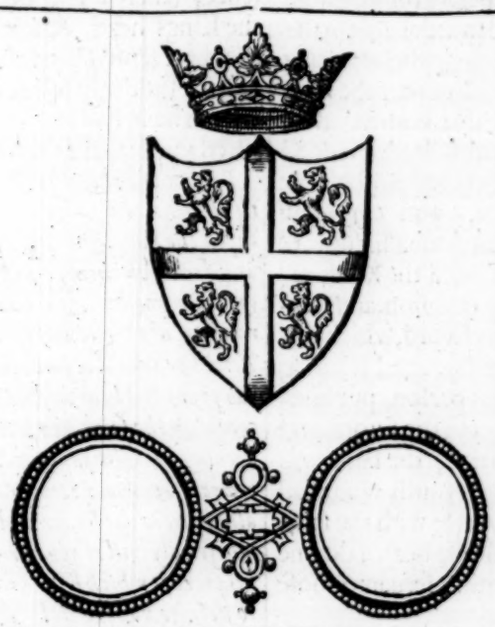
EDVVINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE Eight sole Monarch of the Englisſh-men, his raigne, wiues, and issue.

Monarch. 8.



CHAPTER XX.

THE Monarchy reuerted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northũbrians, wherin it washeld with greater glory and for longer time. For Edwine in King Redwalds life growne very potent, after his death became his succeſſor in the Englisſh Monarchy, and moſt worthily did adorne the ſame by his ciuill iuſtice & diuine piety: his exile, viſion and obtaining of the Northumbrians Crown, we haue already ſpoken of, and therefore without repetition will paſſe on to his end.

An. Do. 617

(2) This Edwine, the ſonne of great Ella, the first King of the Deirians, was the third King that poſſeſſed the ſame, the eighth of Bernicia, the ſecond (and first Chriſtian) King of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three and in the yeere of Chriſt ſix hundred twenty foure, ſucceeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greateſt king of all the Saxons. For (as Beda ſayth) hee ſubdued all the coaſts of Britannie, whereſoeuer any Prouinces were inhabited, either of Engliſh or of Saxons, which thing no king of the Engliſh before him had done; and added the* Mevian Iles vnto his own Dominions. The first of them, next the South, was large and fertile, affording roome for nine hundred and ſixty of his Engliſh Families, and the ſecond, gaue ground for aboue three hundred Tenements.

Hebrides.

(3) His first wife dead, hee became ſuiter for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, deceaſed, and ſiſter to King Eadbald then raigning: whoſe Ambaſſadours were anſwered, that it was not lawfull for a Chriſtian Virgin to bee eſpouſed to a Pagan, leaſt the faith & ſacraments of the heauenly King ſhould bee prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worſhip God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgins beauty, integrity, and piety, was ſo far ouer-gone and rauiſhed therewith, that hee condeſcended, ſhee ſhould with her place retaine her owne Chriſtian Profeſſion, and enioy the Chriſtian ſociety both of her men, women, Prieſts, and ſeruants her attendants in his Court. Theſe couenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reuerend Biſhop, and an honourable retinue, all of them Chriſtians, came to King Edwins Court, and with great ioy ſhee was eſpouſed his Queene.

Esbelburgs good parts.

(4) The greatneſſe & proſperity of this Northumbrian King, was both feared by them afarre off, that raigned in no ſuch power; and beheld by his neerer, with an enuious eye: among whom, Quinchelme that raigned with his father king ouer the Weſt-Saxons, ſent a deſperate ruffin, whoſe name was Eumerus, to murder Edwin the next yeere of his mariage; who repairing to his Court, then reſident neer the riuer Deruent, at the place that is now called Aldeby in Yorkſhire, with a double-edged ſhort ſword, the point therof poiſoned, & girt vnder his garment, vpon Eaſter day entred his Palace, as an Ambaſſadour, & with crafty ſpeech retained the Kings attention; where getting occaſion, and ſtepping forward, drew his ſword, which one Lilla the Kings ſeruant ſaw; and wanting wherwith to defend his perſon, put himſelfe betwixt the King and the ſword: and thorow his body ſo ſlaine, the ſame was ſo farre run, that it dangerouſly wounded the King with his poynt, & with the ſame ſword, before he could be beaten downe by the Guard, ſlew another ſeruant, whoſe name was Fordhere.

A conſpiracy.

(5) It happened the ſame night, being holy Eaſter Sunday, that queen Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for joy whereof, & her ſafe deliuerance, the king gaue thankes to his Idols; which Biſhop Paulinus, then in preſence, greatly reproued, and bad Edwin to giue thankes vnto God, from whom only all goodnes came; and ſpake vnto him of our new-birth in Chriſt: at which conference the King much reioyced, and promiſed that hee would euer after renounce all his idols, & worſhip that Chriſt whom he preached if that God would grant him his life, & giue him victory againſt that King, who had ſent his Manqueller to murder him; in pledge whereof, hee aſſigned Paulinus to baptize his daughter, the which vpon whitſunday following was performed in her, by the name of Eanfled, and ſhee the firſt of the Northumbrians, which receiued that Sacrament. At which time alſo Edwin being recouered of his wound ſo lately receiued, made an army, & marched forth againſt the Weſt-Saxons, & in battle either ſlew or tooke priſoners all them that had conſpired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Countrey.

Biſhop Paulinus.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires proſpering to his own deſires, he was yet in minde diſtracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God he ſhould worſhip. The ſanctity of the Chriſtians moued him much, and the ancient cuſtomes of his Anceſtours ſate neere his heart, betwixt whom there ſeemed a combate in himſelfe. And in theſe dumps ſitting one day alone, it chanced Biſhop Paulinus to haue acceſſe to his preſence, where laying his right hand vpon the Kings head, demanded of him whether hee remembred that ſigne: whereat Edwine ſuddenly fell at the Biſhops feete, whom he in haſt and reuerence preſently lifted vp, & ſpake vnto him as followeth.

Behold O Soueraigne (ſaid he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you haue eſcaped the hand & vengeãce of our moſt hated and dreadfull enemy. Behold alſo by his moſt gracious goodnes you haue obtained the ſoueraignty of raigne and rule of the Kingdome. Remẽber now therfore the third thing which you promiſed him, and deferre no longer to accompliſh the ſame by receiuing his faith, and keeping his Cõmandements, who hath deliuered you from your temporall aduerſities, & exalted you to the honor and maieſty of a King; whoſe holy will if you hereafter obey, and doe his precept which by me is preached, he wil alſo deliuer you from the perpetuall tormẽt of hel, & make you partaker with him in his heauenly kingdom, & eternal bliſſe without end.

Edwine put in minde of couenants.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Councell, wherof Biſhop Coyſi was chiefe, for the eſtabliſhing of the Goſpell, and ſuppreſſing of Idolatry, it was then concluded, that the true God ſhould be worſhipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols ouerthrowne: vnto which action, Coyſi himſelfe became the firſt man; for mounted on horſeback in armour, with a girt ſword & launce in his hand (al which was vnlawfull for thoſe Idoll-Prieſts) hee brake down their Altars, Grates, & Bars, & deſtroyed their Temples wherſoeuer he came. Some ruines thereof not farre from York, and neer vnto the riſing of the riuer Derwent, remained to be ſeene vnto the dayes of Beda, & were thẽ called Gotmund in Gaham. And king Edwin himſelf, with al his Nobility, and moſt of the Cõmons, receiued the lauer of Baptiſme, the 11. yeer of his raign, and of Chriſts Incarnation 627. & 180. yeres after the Saxons entrance into Britaine. The king was baptized the 12. of Aprill, being Eaſter Sunday, at the City Yorke, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the Kings Oratory, which he encloſed about with a deepe foundation; and laying the walles with ſquared ſtones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Conuerter Paulinus Arch-biſhop of that See.

(8) The Gospell thus established in these Northerne parts, spread daily further into other Prouinces, and with such fruit of peace, that in the raign of this Edwin, and thorowout his Dominions, a weake woman with her new-borne babe might haue passed without dammage or danger ouer all the Iland, & from Sea to Sea. And so much did the king tender his Subiects, that his prouident care was extended to the way-faring passengers, for whose vse he enclosed cleare Springs by the wayes, where hee set great Basens of brasse, both to wash and to bathe in; which either for loue or displeasure of the King, no man defaced, or took away.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 2. cap. 16.

And so great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Beda) hee had not only in Battle the Ensignes proper to batttle born before him, but in his ordinary passages thorow the Cities and Townes of his kingdome, there alwayes went an Ensigne-bearer before him. And (to vse the words of the same venerable Author) hee went not in any streete, in which there was not borne before him that kind of Standard which the Romanes called Tufa, & the English Thuuf. That the Romans had such an Ensign, as that which here is called Tufa, Iustus Lipsius in his Commentary vpon that place in Vegetius (lib. 3. c. 5.) where the seuerall Ensignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare correcting that place of Vegetius (where Rufa was set for Tufa) by this place of Beda, & in the same shewing, that Tufa signified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Augustus) was an Ensigne of Monarchy, or absolute gouernment.

(9) But as the Sunne hath his rising, his height and descent, & euer is mooning in the circle of his celestiall orbe, so man hath his birth time, being, and death, and till then is neuer stayed in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they bee Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, go to the shadow of death: neither can the strength of their power, wisdom, or policy, loue or applause, stay the hand here that holds the fatall knife; for so in this King Edwin we see, raised aboue hope to attaine the Diademe, and ruling in loue and liking of the people, was notwithstanding cut off in the midst of his glory and greatnesse of strength.

(10) For Penda the stout Mercian enuying his peace, & Cadwallo the Britaine seeking to receiue his right, ioyned in friendship against this Monarch, & met him as his enemies in the face of a Field. The plain was large, & called Hethfield, wher after a long and most bloudy fight, King Edwin was slaine, with Prince Offryd his son, his whole Host put to the sword, or most shamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yere of our Lord 633. the 6. of his Christianity, the 7. of his Monarchy, the 17. of his Kingdome, and the 47. of his age. His body was lastly buried in S. Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Whitby.

His Wiues.

(11) Quenburge his first wife, was the daughter (as Beda reporteth) of Ceorle; but as all other writers doe witnesse, of Crida King of Mercia. Shee was married vnto him in the beginning of his youth, (and when hee was dispossessed of his inheritance by the Tyrant Ethelfrid, as we haue sayd:) with him she liued a great part of his banishment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the East-Angles deceased, before her husband could recouer his Kingdome.

(12) Ethelburg, surnamed Tate*, was the second wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, & of Queen Berta his first wife. Shee was married vnto him in the yeere of grace 625, being the second of his Monarchy, and was his wife six yeers: but suruiuing him, and desirous to liue a religious life, shee returning into Kent, withdrew her selfe to a place not farre from the Sea-side, called Lymming, wherein shee built a Monastery of Nunnes, and among them spent the rest of her life, and therein dyed, and was there buryed.

Tate.*

His Issue.

(13) Offride, the eldest son of King Edwine & Quenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the East-Angles. He was baptized in the faith of Christ by Paulinus the first Archbishop of Yorke, & was slaine the same day, & in the same battle that his Father was. He had a sonne named Iffy, who was baptized also by Bishop Paulinus, and after the death of his Father & grand-Father, for feare of King Oswald, was conueyed ouer the Seas into France to be brought vp in the Court of King Dagobert, where he dyed in his childhood, and was there honorably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the second sonne of King Edwin and Lady Quenburg his first wife, was born in the time of his Fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offrid by Bishop Paulinus. After his Fathers death, for feare of King Oswald, hee fled to Pen- da King of Mercia, who was his fathers enemy, and his mothers kinſman; by whom he was moſt treacherouſly murthered. He left behind him a ſon named Herèrik, who by his wife Bertſwith had iſſue the vertuous and learned Lady Hilda, Abbeſſe of Streanſhalch: and Queene Hereſwith her ſiſter, the wife of Ethelhere King of the Eaſt-Angles, brother to King Anna, by whom ſhee had iſſue Aldwolfe Elſwold, and Beorne, all three ſucceeding Kings of the Eaſt-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third ſonne of King Edwine, and the firſt of Queen Ethelburg his ſecond wife; was baptized by Paulinus Archbiſhop of Yorke, not long after his father & halfe-brethren; but in ſhort ſpace after his baptiſme, he departed out of this world, euen in the time that hee wore the white attire, which in thoſe dayes was vſed to be worne by ſuch as were newly baptized for a certain ſpace. His body was with all due funerall obſequies enterred within the new Church of S. Peter in the City of Yorke, which his father had newly founded.

(16) Vskfrea, the fourth ſonne of King Edwine, and the ſecond of Queene Ethelburg his ſecond wife, and the laſt and youngeſt of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grand-father. He was baptized by the Archbiſhop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the deceaſe of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent; and from thence conueyed him ouer into France with his nephew Iffy, the ſonne of his halfe-brother Offrid; where hee continued in the cuſtody of King Dagobert, being his mothers coſen-german, and there dyed, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Eanfled, the elder daughter of King Edwine, and Queene Ethelburg his ſecond wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded, and baptized, he being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Oſwy, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, as ſhall bee ſayd. Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3 cap. 25.

(18) Etheldrid the younger daughter, the fifth & laſt-born child to King Edwin and of Queene Ethelburg, was baptized at the ſame time with Ethelme and Vskfrea her brethren. Shee dyed an Infant, the white clothing not yet put off, which in thoſe dayes was vſually worne at certain ſet times after their baptiſme, and was with like funeral obſequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the church of S. Peters in Yorke, which their father had founded.

Oſwald.

OSWALD KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE NINTH MONARCH OF the Engliſhmen, his Raigne, Wife, and Iſſue. Monarch 9.

CHAPTER XXI.

Oswald-the fifth king of Deira, the ninth of Bernicia, the third of Northumberland, & the ninth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, began his raigne the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixe hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrith & his brethren, the ſonnes of wilde Ethelfrid, and Oſrik alſo alſo the ſon of Alfrid king Edwins Vncle, had bin ſecured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-ſhankes liued as baniſhed men, where they learned the true Religion of Chriſt, and had receiued the Lauer of Baptiſme. But Edwines death wrought and diuulged, theſe Princes returne againe to their Country, and the Northumbrians kingdom lately gouerned by one, was now againe diuided into two ſeuerall parts, as formerly it had beene.

(2) Ouer the Deirans, Oſrik was made King and of Bernicia, Eanfrid aſſumed the raign; but Gods iuſtice ouertaking their Apoſtaſie, neither their liues nor this diuiſion laſted long. For Cadwall the Chriſtian, and Penda the Pagan, were Gods inſtruments, that with worthy vengeance in the firſt yeere of their gouernment, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trechery; whoſe names and yeeres of raigne, as vnhappy and of hatefull remembrance, the Hiſtoriographers of thoſe times would haue to be omitted.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(3) But religious Oſwald lamenting the effuſiō of his Countries bloud, long ſlept not their reuenge. For aſſembling his power, which was not great, he ſuddenly and vnlooked for came vpon Cadwallo, & at Deniſeburne pitched downe his tents. The place (ſaith Beda) ſtood neer the wall that Seuerus had made, where Oſwald for the firſt day forbare to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standard ſet vp a Croſſe of wood; whereunto it ſeemeth thoſe dawning dayes of Chriſtianity were ouermuch addicted. Here Oſwald making firſt interceſſion to God, the onely preſeruer of his people, in ſore & long fight obtained great victory, with the ſlaughter of Cadwallo, & of all his Britiſh Army: which ſo accompliſhed, many haue attributed the vertue of that Croſſe to bee no ſmall cauſe of that great ouerthrow. This Croſſe ſo ſet vp, was the firſt wee reade of to haue been erected in England, & the firſt Altar vnto Chriſt among the Bernicians, whoſe pretended miraculous cures, not only in the wood it ſelfe, but in the moſſe, and in the earth wherein it was ſet, let Beda report them, and Stapleton vrge them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our canonicall Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Oſwald himſelfe was a moſt religious & godly King, and tooke ſuch care for the conuerſion and ſaluation of his ſubiects, that he ſent into Scotland for Aidan a Chriſtian Biſhop, to inſtruct his Northumbrians in the Goſpell of truth. And wheras the Biſhop could not ſpeake their language, the king himſelfe was interpreter at his Sermons, and gaue his words in the Engliſh, as hee ſpake & pronounced them in the Scotiſh; which language Oſwald perfectly ſpake, hauing beene there the ſpace of eighteen yeeres.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Heſt. Boetius.

Thus the godly proceedings of the King and Biſhop, produced ſuch increaſe of their heauenly ſeed, that it is reported in ſeuen dayes ſpace, fifteene thouſand Chriſtians receiued Baptiſme; and many of them forſaking the pleaſures of the world, to haue betooke themſelues to a religious and ſolitary life.

(5) At this time the whole Iland flouriſhed both with peace and plenty, and acknowledged their ſubiectiō vnto king Oſwald. For, as Beda reporteth, all the Nations of Britannie which ſpake foure languages that is to ſay, Britaines, Redſhankes, Scots and Engliſhmen, became ſubiect vnto him. And yet being aduanced to ſo royall Maieſty, he was notwithſtanding (which is marueilous tobe reported) lowly to all; gracious to the poore, and bountifull to ſtrangers. The fruits whereof the ſame Author exemplifieth in his bounty and humility towards the poore; who vpon a ſolemne feaſt day, ſeeing many ſuch at his gates, ſent them both the delicates for himſelfe prepared, and commanded the charger of ſiluer to be broken, & diuided among them. The Biſhop much reioycing thereat, tooke the King by the right hand, and prayed that it might neuer conſume; as after his death it did not, but was ſhrined in ſiluer, and in S. Peters Church at Bebba, now Bambrough, with worthy honour was worſhipped for the many miracles and cures that it did, as likewiſe the earth wherein his bloud was ſpilt: with ſuch lauiſh enlargements haue thoſe Writers enterlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3 cap 6.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his ſhadow, and the higheſt tide her ebbe, ſo Oſwald, how holy ſoeuer, or gouernment how good, had emulators that ſought his life, and his Countries ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, enuying the greatneſſe that King Oſwald bare, raiſed wars againſt him, and at a place then called Maſerfield in Shrop-ſhire, in a bloudy and ſore fought battell ſlew him; & not therwith ſatiſfied, in barbarous aud brutiſh immanity, did teare him in peeces; the firſt day of Auguſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus ſixe hundred forty two, being the ninth of his raigne, and the thirty eight of his age: wherevpon the ſaid place of his

his death is called to this day Oſwaldſtree, a faire market town in the ſame County.

(7) The diſmembred limmes of his body were firſt buried in the Monaſtery of Bradney in Lincolnſhire, ſhrined, with his ſtandard of Gold & Purple erected ouer his Tombe, at the induſtry and coſt of his neece Offryd queen of Mercia, wife vnto King Ethelred, and daughter to Oſwin that ſucceeded him. From hence his bones were afterwards remoued to Gloceſter; & there in the North-ſide of the vpper end of the quire in the Cathedrall Church, continueth a faire Monument of him, with a Chappell ſet betwixt two pillars in the ſame Church.

His Wife.

(8) Kineburg, a moſt vertuous Lady & daughter to Kingils the ſixth, and firſt Chriſtian King of the Weſt-Saxons, was the wife of King Oſwald, who became both his father and ſon in the day of her mariage, by receiuing him at the Font, & her of his gift. She was maried vnto him in the ſecond yeere of his raign, which was the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixe hundred thirty ſixe: no other relation made of her beſides the birth of his ſon.

His Iſſue.

(9) Ethelwald, the onely child of king Oſwald & queen Kineburg his wife, was borne in the yeere of our Lord ſixe hundred thirty ſeuen, being the third yeere of his Fathers raigne; and but an Infant at his Fathers death, was diſappointed of the Northumbrian Kingdom by the fraud of his Vncle Oſwin. Notwithſtanding at the death of Oſwin king of Deira, & then not aboue ſixteene yeers of age, he tooke ths ſame kingdome, and by ſtrong hand held it againſt his Vncle ſo long as hee liued, and at his death left it to his coſen Alkefryd, the naturall ſon of king Ofwine, as in the ninth Chapter we haue ſayd.

Oswyn king of the Deirians.

(2) This Oswyn of Deira was the son of Osricke (who did apostate from his faith) and ruling his Prouince in plenty and peace the space of seuen yeeres, was therefore greatly enuied by Oswy of Bernicia, & lastly by him prouoked into the field. Their hosts met at the place then called Wilfares Downe, ten miles west from the village Cataracton, and there attended to hazard the day. But Oswyn finding himselfe too weak for Oswy, also to saue the effusion of Christian bloud, forsooke the field; accompanied onely with one Souldier, and went to Earle Hundwald his friend as he thought, to secure his life. But contrary to trust he deliuered him vnto King Oswy, who cruelly slew him the twentieth of August, and ninth of his raigne, at the place called Ingethling; where afterwards for satisfaction of so hainous an offence, a Monastery was built, as vpon like occasions, many the like foundations were layd; whose stones were thus ioyned with the morter of bloud.

(3) Of this Oswyne thus slaine, Beda reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare vertues and princely qualities, his humility (saith he) and passing lowlinesse excelled: whereof hee thus exemplifieth: The reuerend Christian Bishop Aidan vsing much trauel to preach the Gospell throughout that Prouince, the king for his more ease, gaue him a goodly Gelding with rich and costly trapping. It chanced on a day, as the Bishop rode to minister the word of life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but he not hauing wherewith to releeue him, and pitying his distressed poore estate, presently alighted, and gaue vnto him his horse and rich furniture; wherof when the king heard, he blamed him, and said, What meant you (my Lord) to giue to the begger the horse that I gaue you, with my saddle and trapping? Had we horses of no lower price to giue away to the poore? To whom the Bishop replyed, And is the brood of a beast dearer in your sight, then this poore man the childe of God? The King thus reproued, turned himself towards the fire, and ther sadly pausing vpon his answer, presently gaue from him his sword, and in hast fell at the Bishops feet, desiring forgiuenesse in that he had said. The Bishop much astonied, suddenly lift vp the King, desiring him to sit to meat, and to be merry, which the King immediatly did, but the Bishop contrariwise began to be pensiue and sadde, and the teares to tricle downe his cheekes: in which passion he burst out into these speeches, and said to his Chaplaine in an vnknowne tongue, I neuer till this time haue seen an humble King: and surely his life cannot be long, for this people are not worthy to haue such a Prince to gouern them. But to returne to King Oswy.

(4) Who after many cruell inuasions of the mercilesse Penda, was forced to sue vnto him for peace, with proffers of infinite treasure and most precious Iewels: all which reiected, and the Tyrant comming on, Oswy sought his helpe by supplication to God, & with such zeale as then was embraced, vowed his young daughter Elfled to be consecrated in perpetuall virginity vnto him, with twelue Farmes and their lands, to the erection and maintenance of a Monastery: and thereupon prepared himselfe for battle.

Elfled the daughter of King Oswy.

(5) The Army of this enemy is reported to redouble thirty times his, all well appointed and old tryed Souldiers: against whom Oswy with his son Alkfryd boldly marched, Egfryd his other sonne then being an hostage with Cinwise an vnder queen of the Mercians: Ethelwald the sonne of Oswald, tooke part with Penda, against his naturall Vncle and native Country: so did Ethelherd the brother of Christian Anna, side with this heathenish and cruell Mercian.

And heerein proud Penda lost his life, with the discomfiture of all his Mercian power. Herein also dyed Ethelherd, the East-Angles king, who was the onely motiue to these warres: and Ethelwald escaping, returned with dishonour vnto Deira. (7) After this victory, king Oswy raigned in great glory the space of three yeeres, subduing the Mercians, the south parts of the English, and made the Northerne parts likewise subiect vnto him. He it was that decided the long controuersie for Easters celebration, & founded the Cathedrall Church in Lichfield for a Bishops See: which City with all South-Mercia, diuided from the north by the riuer Trent, hee gaue to Peada the sonne of king Penda, in mariage with his naturall daugh-

CHAPTER XXVI.

An.Do.675

ETHELRED, the third sonne of King Penda, and brother to the last deceased Vulfhere, in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuentie-fiue, began his raign in the Kingdome of Mercia, and at the same time in the Monarchy of the English-men, being the seuenth King among them wore their Diademe, & the twelfth person that bare the Imperiall title of the whole: his claime was not immediately nor next in succession, young Kenred his Nephew standing betwixt him and the Crowne. But himselfe a childe in yeeres, and in them also addicted vnto a priuate life, he gaue his Vncle way to vndergoe so publike a charge, which without contradiction was likewise accepted of the Subiects.

Circumstances belonging to the beginning of his raigne.

(2) His entrance was with warre against the Kentish Lothaire, whose Country he destroyed, sparing neither Churches nor religious Abbeyes, the King not daring to appeare in field. The City Rochester felt also his fury, whose Citizens were ransacked, their buildings ruinated, & their Bishop Putta driuen to such distresse, that he became a Teacher of good Arts and Musicke in Mercia, to maintaine his aged yeeres from the necessitie of perishing want. These stirres (saith Beda) happened in the yeere of grace six hundred seuentie seuen; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing-Starre, as was wonderfull to behold, first discouered in the moneth of August, & for three moneths together continued rising in the morning, and giuing forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glistering flame.

A Blazing Starre.

(3) The remorse of conscience for the bloud he had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destroyed, (besides his intrusions into another mans right) struck so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that euer he bethought him what recompence to make. First therfore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, he thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monasticall life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they liued, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publikely administred their lawes to their people, the iust executions whereof, many times bred the ouerthrow of their Princes, and their Persons neuer secure amidst their owne guards.

(4) But such was the Religion then taught, and the godly zeale of the good Princes then raigning, whose works haue manifested their vertues to posterities, and faith in Christ the saluation of their soules, in whose Paradise we leaue them, and Ethelred to his deuout intent: who to reconcile himselfe first vnto Kenred, bequeathed the Crowne solely to him, although he had a sonne capable thereof: then putting on the habit of religion, became himselfe a Monke, in his owne Monastery of Bradney, where he liued a regular life the terme of twelue yeres, & therin lastly dyed Abbat of the place, when he had raigned thirty yeeres, the yeere of Christs natiuity, seuen hundred sixteene.

She was married vnto him in the yeere of our Lord six hundred seuenty seuen, being the third of his raigne, and the twentieth of her age. Shee was his wife twenty yeeres: and passing thorow the north parts of Mercia, shee was set vpon and slaine by the people of that Country, in reuenge of the death of Peada their King, who had long before been murthered by Alkefled his wife, and her halfe sister, as we haue said. And thus strangely came shee to her vntimely end, the yeere of our Lord six hundred ninety seuen, the twenty three yeere of her husbands raigne, and the fortieth of her owne age.

(2) He is in account the eighth King of that Prouince, & the thirteenth Monarch ſince Hengiſt the Saxon. Hee raigned in peace the ſpace of foure yeeres; then wearie of gouernment, and deſirous of contemplatiō, after the example of his Vncle ſought a more priuate and religious life: & therupon appointing Chelred his coſen germane to rule in his place, in the fifth yeere of his raigne, abandoned his Kingdome & Country, & departed for Rome, accompanied with Offa King of the Eaſt-Saxons, and with Edwine Biſhop of Worceſter: where both theſe Kings were made Monks in the time of Pope Cōſtantine the firſt, Iuſtinian the younger then wearing the Imperiall Crowne; & in a Monaſtery at that Citie, both theſe penitent Conuerts in the Coules & Orders of Monks, ſpent the reſt of their liues, and therein died and were enterred; this Mercian King Kenred hauing had neither wife nor child that I can reade of.

(3) It is not greatly to be wondred at, that in theſe times too much ouerſhadowed with ſuperſtitious-zeale, the holy acts of men, which no doubt were many, and the habit of Monkes, the accounted holy garments of humilitie, were ſo meritoriouſly reſpected & reputed in the deuout hearts of the religious, when by the Clergie (that are accounted the light of the world) in a Councell at Rome held vnder this Pope Conſtantine the firſt, it was decreed & cōmanded, that carued Images, which neither had action, nor life, nor could ſaue themſelues from the ſtroke of deſtruction, ſhould be made to the memoriall of Saints, and ſhould be ſet vp in Churches, with reſpectiue adoration, contrary to GODS moſt expreſſe commandement, and condemned for idolatry by the warrant of ſacred Scripture.

Henry Hunt. lib. 4.

Chro. of Holl. (3) The sinnes of these times both in Prince and people, were many and great, as by the Epistles of Boniface an Englishman, and Arch-bishop of Mentz, is most manifest, wherein he reproued his adulterous life, who refrayning to marry, wallowed in filthy lecheries; by whose example the Noblemen of Mercia did the like, and their women, as well Nunnes as others, made away their children borne out of wedlocke, whereby the graues were filled with dead bodies, as hell it selfe with damned soules. And in another Epistle sent vnto Cuthbert, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, he complaineth of the English Nunnes, who wandring in pilgrimage vnder shew of deuotion, liued in pleasure & wanton fornications through all the Cities of France and of Lombardy.

Nunnes infamy.

(4) This his Epistle tooke so good effect, that in repentance King Ethelbald released and priuiledged the Church from all tributes to himselfe, and built the Abbey of Crowland in Lincoln-shire, for the pacifying of GODS wrath towards his sinnes; when also it was enacted by Cuthbert and his Clergie, in a Conuocation held in his Prouince, that the sacred Scriptures should be read in their Monasteries, the Lords Prayer and Creed, taught in the English tongue: which accordingly was done. Which Councell was held in the thirtie yeere of this Kings raigne, and of Christs incarnation seuen hundred fortie eight.

(5) Finally, when he had ruled fortie two yeeres, fighting against Cuthred the West-Saxon, in a war not prudently vndertaken, he was trayterously slaine by his owne Subiects, at the procurement of Bernred, a Leader of them, who affecting the Kingdome by this stratagem of Treason, sought to attaine it, but was himselfe slaine by Offa the Mercian, before that this ill sowen seed could take any roote. The place of this Great Ethelbalds death, was Secondone, three miles from Tamworth in the County of Warwick; and of his buriall, Repton in Darby-shire, where with honourable obsequies he was entered, the yeere of Christs humanitie seuen hundred fiftie eight, hauing had neither Wife nor Children.

OFFA THE ELEVENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE SIXTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, his Acts, Raigne, Wife, and Issue.

Monarc. 16.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

An. Do. 758

OFfa, the cosen of King Ethelbald, after some time of Inter-regnum, succeeded him in his Dominions of Mercia; a man of so high stomack & stoutnes of mind, that he thought nothing vnpossible for him to attaine: and for vertue & vice, so equally composed, that hardly could be iudged to whether of them the scale of his cariage most inclined, although the Monk of S. Albans and writer of his life, doth blanch out his graces with superlatiue prayses.

Liber M. S.

(2) His Parents he nameth Twinfreth and Mercella, and himselfe he saith to haue been first named Pinered, born both lame, deafe, and blinde, wherein he so continued vnto his mans estate. The rage of Bernred (saith the same Author) had forced all three into a solitary place, where suddenly by miracle Pinered was restored, and for that cause called another Offa; who presently assailed, and in a great battle manfully fought, slew the vsurping Bernred. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly imbraced & receiued him for their King; who began his raigne with greater shew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleuenth that had raigned in that Prouince, and is accounted the sixteenth Monarch of the English-men.

The parents of Offa.

Bernred slaine.

(3) His neighbour Kings foreseeing whereat his eye glanced, sollicited by letters Charles the Great, then King of France, against him; who wrote vnto Offa, in their behalfe, and in threatning wise commanded him to desist. But he was so farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

King Charles the Great.

(4) The first that felt his fury, were the Kentishmen, vnder Alrike their King, whose ouerthrow was the lesse dishonorable (saith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquished by so great a Monarch. The place was Otteford, vnfortunate to them, where their King was slaine by the hand of Offa himselfe, their Forces quite discomfited by the losse of this field, and their Country trodden downe vnder the feet of the Mercians.

Malmesbury.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched, and beyond Humber made hauocke of all that stood against him; whence returning triumphant, he set vpon the West-Saxons, that had formerly ioyned with his enemies: the place was Benfinton, which Castle King Offa tooke, with the discomfiture of King Kenwolfe, and all his West-Saxons, who sought their reuenge by the aydes of the Britaines in Wales

Benfinton Castle taken by King Offa.

Lib. S. Albans. M. S. Marmodius a Welsh King.

(6) In this Interim of complements for a further securitie, Offa caused a great ditch to be drawn betwixt his and the Britaines borders, which worke began at Basingwarke in Flint-shire, and North-wales, not far from the mouth of Dee, and ranne along the mountaines into the South, and ended neere Bristow at the fall of Wye; the tract whereof in many places is yet seene, and is called to this day Clawdh Offa, or Offaes ditch. Marmodius, who openly bare saile to this wind, and seemed to winke at Offaes intents, secretly called a Councell of State, wherin he declared how the Act thus in working, would soone proue the bane of libertie vnto their Country, and the marke of dishonour to themselues and posteritie for euer; therefore his aduice was, that by some stratagem it might be staid betime.

Marmodius treachery.

(7) To this his Britaines consented, the truce yet lasting, & the feast of Christs Natiuitie euen then at hand; in the celebration whereof was held the greatest aduantage with least suspect, to put themselues in action against it; and secretly working the assistance of their allies the Saxons, both of the South, the West, and the North, vpon Saint Stephens day at night, suddainly brake downe the banke of this Fortification, filling vp againe a great part of the Ditch, & in the morning most furiously rushed into Offa his Court, putting a great number to the sword, who were more intentiue & regardfull to the Feast, then to any defence from their cruell and mercilesse swords.

(8) These wrongs King Offa delayed not to requite, first making their hostages his vassals & slaues, and then with a great army entring Wales, in a bloudy and sore-fought battle he ouercame Marmodius and all his associates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour ouer all his enemies, triumphantly after ten yeeres wars abroad, returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor suffering his title to be enlarged according to his Conquests: yet he was not neglectiue of regall state, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Albans, which saith, That in regard of his great prerogatiue, and not of any pride, he first instituted and commanded, that euen in times of peace also, himselfe and his successors in the Crowne, should as he passed through any Citie, haue Trumpeters going and sounding before them, to shew that the person of the King should breed both feare, and honour in all, which either see him or heare him.

(9) Vnto King Charles of France he wrote in excuse of his warres, and desire of his amitie; whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnesse, both for his victories, and the Christian pietie in his land embraced; desiring of Offa safe conduct for such his subiects, as came to his country in deuotion to God; and withall sent to him, (for a present) a Booke of the Decrees of the second Councell of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to vse Roger Houedens owne words) was sent vnto King Charles from Constantinople, Wherein (saith he) alas for pitie, by the vnanimous assertion of three hundred Bishops or more congregated in that Councell, were decreed many things inconuenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith; as is most especially the worshipping of Images, which the church of God doth vtterly detest. Against which Booke *Albinus wrote an Epistle, admirably strengthned by the authoritie of the holy Scriptures, which together with the foresaid Booke himselfe presented in the name of the Princes & Bishops of this land, vnto the foresaid Charles King of France. Such intercourse both for State & Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

King Charles congratulateth Offa.

(10) His last wars (according to mine Author) were against the Danes, whom he forced to their ships with the losse as well of their booties, as of many of their liues, and then (saith he) with the spirit of humilitie, both to recall himselfe from the trace of bloud, and to the better establishment of his Kingdomes peace, he ioyned in affinitie with his neighbour Princes, vpon whom he bestowed his daughters in mariage.

Offaes last warres.

(11) And making Egfryd his sonne a King with himselfe, in great deuotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Inas the West-Saxon, hee made his Kingdome subiect to a Tribute, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Rom-Scot; besides other rich gifts that he gaue to Pope Hadrian for canonizing Albane a Saint: in honour of whom, and in repentance of his sinnes, at his returne (ouer against Verolanium, in the place then called Holmehurst, where that Protomartyr of Britaine, for the constant profession of Christ, lost his head) Offa built a magnificke Monastery in Anno 795. indowing it with lands and rich reuenewes for the main-

His repentance.

(12) Also in testimony of his repentance for the bloud he had spilt, he gaue the tenth part of all his goods vnto the Churchmen, & vnto the poore. At Bathe he also built another Monastery, and in Warwickshire a Church, where the adjoyning Towne, from it and him beareth the name Off-Church.

Off-ley towne.

(13) Finally, when he had raigned thirty nine yeares, he died in peace at his towne Off-ley, the nine and twentieth of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, seuen hundred ninetie foure: and with great solemnity his body was buryed without the Towne of Bedford in a Chappell standing vpon the banke of Ouse, which long since was swallowed vp by the same Riuer: whose Tombe of Lead (as it were some phantasticall thing) appeareth often (saith Rouse) to them that seeke it not, but to them that seeke it, is altogether inuisible.

His Issue.

(14) Quendrid the wife of King Offa hath not her parentage set downe by any of our Writers: notwithstanding, the recorder of this his life, saith that her name was Drida, and that shee was the kinswoman to Charles the great King of France, and by him for some offence banished his Realme, who arriuing vpon the coasts of England in a shippe without Tackle, was taken thence, and relieued by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where shee changed her name vnto Pretronilla, with whom he fell so farre in loue that he made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his parents. She was a woman of condition ambitious, couetous, and cruell, as appeared specially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the East-Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whose port shee so much enuied, that shee procured him to be treacherously murthered: the manner the foresaid Author declared to be by his fal into a deepe pit, purposely made in his bed-chamber and vnder his chaire of estate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind man; that the Well which beares his name sprung vp presently in the place where it lay; that the bloud thereof gaue the blind man his sight, and that Dryda died in the same pit which shee had digged for Ethelbert, I leaue to the credit of my Author, and the liking of my Reader: but certaine it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the same was committed, by the death of her selfe, her husband, and her sonne, and the translation of that Kingdome from the Mercians to the West-Saxons.

In the life of S. Albane, prefixed before the Ledger booke of that Abbey.

Quendred her treachery.

Quendred rewarded with the like paine.

An ancient Saxon coyne inscribed with her name, CENEDRED REGIN. we haue found and here placed, which the judicious suppose to be hers, and that not vnlikely, shee being so powerfull, proud, and ambitious.

His Issue.

(15) Egfryd the onely sonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was the onely ioy and pride of his parents, who succeeded his Father in his Dominions and Title, and in the same yeare also in the shades of death.

Egfryd the onely sonne of Offa.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldest daughter of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was marryed to Brithrick the sixteenth King of the West-Saxons: she was a Lady of passing beautie, but withall of an insolent disposition, hating all whom her husband loued, and practising the deathes of them that shee hated; Shee departed into France after the poysoning of her husband, and for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great preiudice of the West-Saxons Queenes, as in the raigne of Brithrik we haue declared.

Ethelburga the first daughter.

(17) Elfled the second daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, by the report of Randulph Higden the monke of Chester, was the second wife to Ethelred King of Northumberland, who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his subiects rose in Armes against him, and slew him in the last yeare of King Offa his raigne.

An.Do.794 EGfryd, the ſon of king Offa, ſucceeded his father in the Mercians kingdom, whereof he was the twelfth in number, & in the Monarchy of the Engliſh-men, ranked in account the ſeuenteenth. He began his raigne the 13. day of Iuly, in the yeere of Chriſts natiuitie 794. The firſt buſineſſe that he vndertooke after he came to the crowne, was the reſtauration of ancient priuiledges to the Church, which his father had depriued them of; and great hope was conceiued of his further proceedings, had not GOD cut him off by vntimely death. For hauing raigned onely foure moneths, he gaue place vnto nature, and to another ſucceſſour, the ſinnes of the people deſeruing no ſuch Prince: for whoſe cauſe, and his fathers great bloudſhed, as Alcuine wrote to Osbertus, he was taken away ſo ſoone. Flecmi Albinus.

KEnwolfe, not ſo nere in bloud to King Egfryd, as he was like him in all vertuous cõditions, by him was ordained to ſucceed in his Dominions, whereby he became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, in the yeare of our Lord ſeuen hundred ninety ſeuen. At home he was an example of pietie, peace, and religion, and ſet the ſcale of juſtice without reſpect to all alike; abroad temperate, humble, and courteous, without vaine oſtentation or ambitious conceits; in warres he was ſtout and victorious; in peace ſtudious to enrich his ſubiects: briefly, at all times ſo carrying himſelfe, that enuy could not touch him with her tongue.

Kenwolfes praiſe.

(2) Whether vpon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians againſt thoſe of Kent) I cannot ſay; but true it is, that in the entrance of his raign, he entred that Prouince with a great hoſt of men, and in a ſore fought field diſcomfited the Kentiſh, and carried away priſoner their King, whoſe firname was Pren. His Kingdome he gaue to Cuthred, & kept him captiue in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his ſubiects diſhonour.

(3) But Kenwolfe in peace, and minding the workes of true pietie, gaue himſelfe to the building of a goodly Church at Winchcombe in Gloceſter-ſhire; where vpon the day of dedication, in the preſence of Cuthred, (aſſigned his Viceroy in Kent,) thirteene Biſhops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourſe of people, he led Pren this Kentiſh captiue vp to the high Altar, and there without either his entreatie, or ranſome for Redemption, releaſed and ſet him free; ſhewing thereby his deuotion to God, and the heroical parts of a magnanimous Prince.

(5) Elfryd, the wife of King Kenwolfe, hath not her parentage certainly reported by any of our Hiſtorians; yet ſome later vpon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, haue thought her to be the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath been ſaid: but in theſe obſcurities, coniecture may wander aſtray.

And in the ſame yeere that he beganne his reigne, by the treaſon of his vnnaturall ſiſter hee was murthered, and firſt obſcurely buried, but afterwards ſolemnly remoued and repoſed neere to his Father in the Monaſterie of Winchcombe, as in the Mercians Kings ſucceſſions wee haue ſaid.

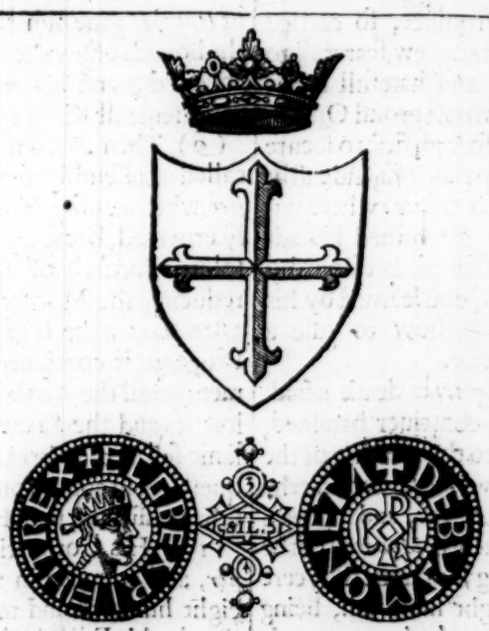
EGBERT THE NYNETEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, THE NINETEENTH, BVT FIRST SOLE AND ABSOLVTE MONARCH OF THE Engliſh-men, his Acts, Wife, and Iſſue.

Monarc. 19.



CHAPTER XXXI.

An. Do. 800

THE Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the ſpring of an entire Monarchie began to ſhew it ſelfe, and the glory of the Engliſh-men more cleerely to ariſe: for though they had weakned each other by their owne wars, yet ſtood their power ſtrong in the poſſeſſion of the whole, and the ouerborne Britaines held ſtill at the worſt.

(2) But ſuch is the diſpoſe of the ſole diſpoſer of Empires, that they haue their riſings, their fals, and their fals: neuer ſtaying in one and the ſame point, neither entailed to one and the ſame Nation, how ſtrong, politicke or populous soeuer. The proofe whereof is apparant in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whose change of State vnto, & in, this seuenfold Gouernment hath hitherto beene seene: the seuerall Kings thereof long contending to branch their own fountaines furthest and fairest, lastly let them fall into one streame, which so meeting, made a more famous cõfluence in this Monarchy, then the seauen heads of Nilus in the Egyptian Sea.

West Saxons ambition.

(3) Formerly, the Kentish, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, & the Mercians, who through no lesse then eight descents had worne the Emperiall Diademe, whose rayes shone now so bright in the West-Saxons eyes, that they againe sought to re-estate themselues in so glorious a possession. For, whereas Brightrik was possessed & contented with the West-Saxon Crowne, neither that worne without iealousie & feare; yet others of the bloud royall from Cherdik raised the wings of their soaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the last nor the least in the opiniõ of the people, or suspect of his Prince.

Egberts exigents and reliefes.

(4) This Egbert hauing command of some part of that Prouince, so carried himselfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the enuious Ethelburg his most proud Queen, by whom he was enforced first to secure himselfe with the Mercian Offa; and lastly constrained to flie into France: where vnder Charles the Great, he turned his aduersitie into an occasion of his valour, by seruing in his warres, and learned by his politicke gouernment, how to rule a quiet or disturbed State.

Simon Dunel. saith 802. Mat. Westminst saith 803.

(5) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriuer banished, Egbert is sollicited to the wearing of the West-Saxon crowne, where he became the eighteenth King in number, and nineteen yeres after the nineteenth Monarch of the English-men; entring his raigne the yeere of Christ Iesus, eight hundreth, being the same yeere that Charles was made Emperour of the West, and Conwall then ruling ouer the Scots.

(6) His first warres were against the Cornish, and their associats the Welsh, both of them a remnant of the old Britaines, who had beene oftentimes vanquished, but neuer would seeme to be subdued, and for foureteene yeeres continuance held side against Egbert; which their resistance so prouoked his furie that hee enacted a most seuere Law against them, commanding that no Britaine should presume to passe ouer great Offaes ditch, and present death to them that durst set foote vpon any English ground. Their great Caer-legion (now West-chester) he tooke from them, & at London from their West-gate cast downe the brasen Image of Cadwallo there set vp by the Britaines for a terrour to the Saxons, as we haue said.

Iohn Beuer.

Chap. 12.

(7) His warres thus prospering, his puissance grew dreadfull, and his glory much enuied at by the other Princes, whereof Bernulfe of Mercia was the first attempter that sought to plucke the wing of this West-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne downfall; for Egbert joyning battaile with him at Ellenden, ouerthrew his power, and in that quarrell Bernulfe was lastly slaine.

Chap. 10. sect. 6.

Will. Malmsb.

(8) Kent was the next, and fairest marke in Egberts eye, whose King not gracious in his owne subiects sight, was the easier to be subdued; him he chased ouer Thamisis, and added not onely that Countie, but also Sussex and Surrey, for Prouinces vnto his owne Kingdome: next were the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and in truth all, that both vpon the North, & the South of Humber gaue him obedience; so that the bounds of his dominion were greatly enlarged, and his royall authoritie by those seuerall Kings acknowledged.

Egbert the first sole Monarch.

(9) Then to confirme his estate hee called an assembly vnto the City Winchester, where causing himselfe to be solemnly crowned, became the first Saxons absolute Monarch of the whole Iland, so reducing the Monarchiall title from the Mercians to the West-Saxons, in whose Progeny it continued without reuersement vntill the Danes first got, and againe lost it, and the Saxons issue failing, the same fell to the Normans Duke by Conquest, as in continuance of our History, Christ assisting, shall be seene.

An. Do. 816

(10) His Coronation was at Winchester, and entrance in the yeare of grace eight hundred and nineteene, at which time by his Edict in that Citie dated, hee caused all the South of the Iland to be called England, according to the Angles, of whom himselfe came, and promising great felicity to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had beene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and bloud, had made themselues Lords of other mens rights, and of one Kingdome no lesse then seuen, are now endangered gered to be made ſeruants vnto ſubiection, and by warre and bloud their ſeuenfold Kingdome brought againe vnto one; neither yet freed from the reuenge of bloudy violence: for that a fierce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceaſed not continually to inuade them, till they had ſubdued & ſet the crowne thereof vpon their own heads, who in king Brightricks daies, and about the yere ſeuen hundred eightie ſeuen, hauing with three veſſels landed in the Weſt of Englād, at three ſeuerall times, in ſo many ſeuerall places, ſought the ruine of the land in the raigne of this Egbert.

Simeon Dunel. Henry Hunt. Mat. Weſtminſ.

(12) The firſt was in his thirtie third yeare, when with thirty fiue ſhippes they landed at Lindisferne vpon the North of England, where they were met & fought with at Carham, but with ſuch loſſe to the Engliſh, that two chiefe Captaines, Dudda & Oſmond; two Biſhops, Herefrid of Wincheſter, & Vigferd of Shirborne, with many Souldiers were therin ſlaine, King Egbert himſelfe hardly eſcaping by the couert of the night.

(13) Their ſecond attempt was in the ſecond yeare following, when in Weſt-Wales they landed, vnto whom the Britaines there ioyned, and at the place called Hengiſtentō abode the King in field, where Egbert with proſperous fortune vanquiſhed & ſlew both the Danes & the Welſh.

(14) The third place of their arriuage was Sheepie in Kent, which Iland they ſacked, & with much adoe were expelled in the laſt of King Egberts raign, & but the new beginning of their ſauage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Worceſter is ſaid to be the ſonne of Alkemund, who was the ſon of Eafa, and he the ſonne of Eoppa, the ſon of Ingils, the brother of Ine, the eleuenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and both of them the ſonnes of Kenred, deſcended from Cherdik the firſt King of that Prouince: he was but low of ſtature, yet well compoſed and ſtrong of limme, very valiant, wiſe, and politicke, a skilfull Souldier, and as great in minde, as fortunate in warre; he raigned ouer the Weſt-Saxons the ſpace of thirty ſix yeares and ſeuen moneths, and Monarch of the whole Iland ſeuenteen yeares: his death hapned the fourth day of February, and yeare of Chriſts Incarnation eight hundred thirtie ſix.

The continuance of his raigne.

(16) His body was with all obſequies ſolemnly buryed at Wincheſter, and his bones ſince takē vp, remaine with others in that Cities Cathedrall Church, beſtowed in Cheſts ſet vpon the wall of each ſide the Quier, with theſe verſes neither ancient, nor elegant, thereon inſcribed:

Hic Rex Egbertus pauſat cū Rege Kenulpho,
Nobis egregia munera vterque tulit.

His Wife.

(17) Redburg, the wife of King Egbert, was the firſt of the Weſt-Saxons, that by their new made law was depriued of title authority, or place of a Queene, notwithſtanding it ſeemes ſhee bare a great ſtroke with her husband, in that Iohn Beuer the Monke of Weſtminſter reporteth, that ſhe procured a law to be made againſt the Britaines, the penalty wherof was preſent death for any of them to ſet footing within the Realme of England, or to paſſe the Ditch that King Offa had made.

Redburgs cruelties.

His Iſſue.

(18) Ethelwolfe, the eldeſt ſon of King Egbert, and Lady Redburg his wife, was in his childhood cōmitted to the charge of Helmeſtan Biſhop of Wincheſter, vnder whom he was carefully trained vp in learning and vertue, who comming to mans eſtate proued alſo a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his Fathers power againſt Baldred King of Kent, whom he forced to flie ouer the Thamiſis, and to abandon his Kingdome, which he ſubdued to the ſubiection of his Father, and afterwards ſucceeded him in the Monarchy of the Engliſh-men.

Ethelwolfe eldeſt ſonne.

(19) Ethelſtane, the younger ſonne of King Egbert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his Father deputed King ouer the Kentiſhmen, the South-Saxons, and the Eaſt-Saxons, after he had brought them vnto his ſubiection; which people he moſt valiantly defended againſt the inuaſions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by ſea and land, and at Sandwich gaue them a moſt memorable ouerthrow in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred fiftie one, being the ſixteenth of his brother King Ethelwolfes raigne; in whoſe time he deceaſed, and is reported to haue left a ſon named Oſtride, who by reaſon of his minoritie ſucceeded not in his Fathers Dominions, which Ethelbert the ſecond ſonne of King Ethelwolfe entred vpon, & being Monarch reunited theſe Kingdomes inſeparably vnto the Monarchy.

Ethelſtan yonger ſonne.

(20) Edgith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwolfe committed to the charge and bringing vp of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowned for her holineſſe of life, named Modewine, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Disciplesse of the said Lady, named Athea, and made Gouernesse of a Monastery of Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had giuen her, called Polleſworth, situated in Arden in the north verge of the Countie of Warwicke, wherein shee liued, dyed, and was honourably buried, and the place in regard of her afterwards called Saint Editha of Polleſworth.

CHAPTER XXXII.

An. Do. 837

Ethelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, cõmitted in his youth to the care of Helmeſtan Bishop of Wincheſter, and by him vnto Swithun a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke such a liking vnto the quiet & solitary life, (onely enioyed by men of Religion, all other estates molested to withstãd the intruding Danes) that he vndertooke the Monkish vow and profession, and was made Deacon; shortly after which degree taken, Helmeſtan died, in whose place Prince Ethelwolfe was consecrated, as Roger Houeden affirmeth, or at least elected, (as Iohn Brampton Abbat of Iaruaux writeth) Bishop of Wincheſter. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreatie of the Nobles, and partly by constraint of the Clergie, he was made King, and was by the authoritie of Pope Gregory the fourth, (whose creature in both professions he was) absolued and discharged of his vowes.

(2) He entred his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the yeare of Christs Incarnation, eight hundred thirtie seuen, and was the nineteenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Engliſh-men. His Bishopricke he gaue vnto Swithun his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withstand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vtter subuersion of his faire Land: whose fift innaſion in his first yeare happened; which drew the Saxons ciuill warres vnto a constrained peace, hauing more then they could well doe to defend their liues frõ their slaughtering swords, or to saue their vniustly gotten land from the spoyles of those common enemies; who, not like Conquerours, but destroying Caterpillers, left nothing vndeuoured whereſoeuer they came, and had now begunne their mercilesse depopulations in diuers places at once, so that the distracted Engliſh were to seeke where was most need first to withstand.

(3) At Hampton and Portesmouth many of these Norway Pirates had entred; at Hampton with their ouerthrow; at Portesmouth with victory; and the same time at Carrum, a Troupe of these Danes discomfited King Ethelwolfes power. The next yeare at Merseware, Lindsey, in East-Angle, and Kent, they did much mischiefe, and harried all the Countrey before them: yet in his tenth yeare at Pedredesmouth, the Somerset and Dorset-shire men gaue them a memorable ouerthrow, vnder the conduct of Earle Enwulfe, Bishop Adelstan, and Osred their Captaines.

(4) But in the sixteenth yeare of this King, the great Planet Mars seemed to predominate continually, and Fortune to cast the chance of Victory euer on his side: for two hundred and fiftie shippes, (some reckon a hundred more) entred into Thamisis mouth, and set on shore an infinite number of these destroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had sacked and left waste, had pierced into Mercia, and chased Berthulfe their King out of his Country, and now in Southery had pitched their battle, as able and resolute to abide all the power of the English; whither King Ethelwolfe with his sonne Prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Ocley; wherein after a long and sore fight, the victory fell to the English, with such slaughter of these Norway inuaders, as is incredible to report, and the same held as great and famous, as euer had hapned in the land before?

Henry Hunt. Aruon Rivall.

(5) With the like successe his Brother Athelstan King of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chasing them to Sea, tooke nine of their ships; and in Deuon-shire, Earle Ceorle at Winleshore so ouerthrew their whole power, that in despaire they withdrew themselues into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the winter season; and if destiny had not withstood the English, the Danes had beene expulsed for euer. But the Saxons seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrels with the euer-depressed Britaines, against whom Burthred the Mercian obtained the assistance of King Ethelwolfe in his eighteenth yeare, whose daughter Ethelswith he had obtained in mariage; whereby for a while was encreased the fame and power of that valiant, but vnfortunate King.

See Chap. 10. Sect. 20.

(6) In this State the affaires of the land stood vnto the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelwolfes raigne, who now remembring his former Ecclesiasticke profession, ordained that riches and Lands due to holy Church should be free from all Tributes or Regall seruices; and in great deuotion went himself to Rome, where he was both honourably receiued, and entertained the space of a whole yeere; in which time he new built the English Schoole that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming also his Grant of Peter-pence, and further couenanting in lieu of his kinde entertainment to pay yearely three hundred markes to Rome, thus to be employed; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, another hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that euermore must be kissed and largely paid.

Will. Malmesb. Simon Dunelm.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, he there married Iudith the most beautiful daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, he euer placed her in a Chaire of Estate, with all other maiestical complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the West-Saxons for Ethelburgaes offence, formerly made. Which his doing so disliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldest Sonne, Adelstan Bishop of Shirborne, and Enwulfe Earle of Somerset rose vp rebelliously in armes and sought to depose him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a comprimize, and the land to be diuided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with such partialitie that the better part Westward was allotted to Ethelbald: which vnequalitie gaue great suspition, that this reuolt was rather grounded vpon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all disloyall attempts of seditious subiects against their soueraigne Lords.

Will. Malmesb.

(8) Howsoeuer it was, long after this he liued not, but left his Monarchy vnto his eldest sonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his second, to be King of Kent and Essex, which Countries he had Conquered. Hee raigned twentie yeares, one moneth, and nine dayes, and deceased at a place called Stanrige, the 13. day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred fiftie seauen, being the twentie one of his raigne. His body was first buryed at the place of his decease, and afterwards remoued into the Cathedrall Church at Winchester.

Ethelwolfes time of raigning.

His Wiues.

Osburgs parents.

(9) Osburg, the first wife of King Ethelwolfe, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Oslake, who had the office of Great Butler of England, & was descended of the stock of Stuffe and Withgar two brethren, being noblemē of the people called Iutes, who were the first Princes of the Ile of Wight; and Nephewes to Cherdike, and cosen germans to Kenrike the first and second Kings of the West-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarchs of the Englishmen. She was the second Kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. She deceased three yeares before the King her husband, in the ninteenth yere of his raign, being the yere of Christs Natiuitie eight hundred fiftie-fiue.

Iudith a second wife.

(10) Iudith his second wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and king of France, as we haue said: her mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Vodon Earle of Orleance. Shee was a Lady of passing beautie, and marryed to this King in France; and when shee came into England was receiued with the title and place of a Queene, in abolishment of the peruerse law of the West-Saxons, made against the Kings wiues, as before was touched. Shee was his wife three yeares, and suruiued him without any issue.

His Issue.

Ethelbald the first sonne.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldest son of King Ethelwolfe & of Lady Osburg his first wife, was brought vp in his youth in the exercise of warre, & serued vnder his Father in the great Victory obtained against the Danes at Ocley in Surrey, in the yeere eight hundred fifty one: afterwards he turned his force against his Father; and at his returne from Rome, practised to defeat him of his Kingdome, and was ready to haue giuen him battaile, had not his Father parted with him his Dominion.

Ethelbert the second sonne.

(12) Ethelbert, the second son of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the decease of his vncle Ethelstan, appointed and placed his Successor in his Kingdome ouer the South-Saxons, the Kentish, and the East-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it seemeth) that hee should intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithstanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holdē of all men for law, equity, and reason, that he should succeed him in the Monarchy: and so he did, with the consent of his brethren, and without resistance, or contradiction of any other.

Ethelred a third sonne.

(13) Ethelred, the third sonne of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, had by the disposition of his father in his last will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all such land as King Egbert his Grandfather had before he was King, and was no part of the Demaines of the Kingdome; and this was diuided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the Kingdome was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred should succeed his brother Ethelbald in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons; notwithstanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the decease of King Ethelbald, entred into the other part, adioyning it to his former Kingdome, and was King of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who succeeded him in the Monarchy.

Elfred a fourth sonne.

(14) Elfred the fourth sonne of King Ethelwolfe, and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was borne at Wantage in Barkshire, in the yere of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine; & the thirteenth of his fathers raigne. Being a child of fiue yeeres old, he was sent very honorably attended to the Citie of Rome, where Leo the fourth then Bishop confirmed him, was his Godfather at the Confirmation, and annointed him to the expectation of a Kingdome. Growne in yeares, he grew so in discretion, magnanimitie and fauour of all men, that in the succeeding raignes of his three elder Brethren, he ruled as a Vice-roy or secondary King vnder euery of them, and after them at the last succeeded in the English Monarchy.

Ethelswith a daughter.

(15) Ethelswith, the daughter of King Ethelwolfe & Lady Osburg, was maried to Burthred the twentieth King of Mercia, which marriage was solemnized at the towne of Chippingham in Wiltshire, in the moneth of Aprill, & yeere of Christs Natiuitie eight hundred thirty fiue, and the fifteenth of her fathers raigne; but within twenty two yeares after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdome, and departed into Italy, where the King died the same yere in the English Colledge at Rome: shee liued after him fifteene yeares in the habite of a Nunne, at the Citie of Padua, and there dyed, and was honourably buried in the yere of our Lord God eight hundred eightie nine, which was the eighteenth yeare of her brother King Elfreds raigne.

Neote a supposed sonne.

(16) Neote, supposed by Iohn Capgraue the Legend writer, to be the son of King Ethelwolfe, wolfe, was in his youth brought vp at Glaſtenbury, vnder Dunſtan, who was afterward Archbiſhop of Canterbury. He proued a man of great learning, and was one of the firſt Readers of Diuinitie in the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, at the foundation, or as ſome will haue it, the reſtauration thereof by King Elfred; hee planted a Monaſtery in Cornwall, whereunto he vſed for deuotion and ſtudious meditations often to withdraw himſelfe, which of his abode there, was afterward called Neoteſtocke; and when he was dead, his body was with great honour interred in the County of Huntingdon, at a place then called Annulfesbery, and afterward in regard of his interment, Saint Neotes, and now Saint Needes.

ETHELBALD THE TVVENTIETH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTY ONE MONARCH OF THE Engliſhmen, his Acts, and Raigne.

Monarc. 21.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An. Do. 857 Floren. Wigorn.

Ethelbald, the eldeſt ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, hauing had part of the kingdome in the life time of his Father, after his death entred vpon the whole, and was the 20. King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the 21. Monarch of the Engliſh-men, beginning his Raigne in the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation 857.

His warres againſt the Danes.

(2) His youth he had ſpent in the exerciſe of war, hauing made proofe of valor in his ſeruice againſt the Danes in many battles; and likewiſe attempted (though not in ſo good a cauſe) to haue fought againſt his owne father. Which his aſſaies, as they ſeemed valiant and vnnaturall, yet being in the quarrell of the Weſt-Saxons Law, enacted in preiudice of their Queenes, he was both ſided and approoued, as hath beene ſaid.

(3) But howſoeuer vnwilling he was this faire Queene ſhould ſit in ſtare by his Fathers ſide, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or man, he laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his ſinfull and inceſtuous bed. Which act, though foule enough, ſome haue made worſe, in reporting his Wife to be his owne Mother, whom King Ethelwolfe kept for his Concubine. And ſurely this his ſinne was not long vnpuniſhed by the ſhortneſſe of his raigne and life, leauing no other memory of his acts, beſides this foule blot to his faire name.

Will. Malmesb.

The time of his raigning.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeares and an halfe, and death chanced vpon the twentieth day of December, the yeare of Christs assuming our flesh, eight hundred and sixtie. His body was first buryed at Shirburne in the County of Dorset, where at that time was the Cathedrall Church and Episcopall See; but afterwards was remoued and enterred at Salisbury, in the County of Wiltshire.

His Wife.

(5) Iudith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his own Father, a most vnlawfull matrimony contracted against all law of God or of nature; which being both dissolued and punished by the hastie death of the King, and shee returning towards her father and country in Flanders, was rauished by Baldwin the Forester of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept vntill shee consented to become his wife; who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperour Charles her Father, was by him created the first Earle of Flanders, by whom she had issue Baldwin the second, who espoused Lady Elfrid, the youngest daughter of Elfrid King of England; from whom, through fiue descents lineally, Maud Queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour, descended, and from her, all our Norman English Kings vnto this day.

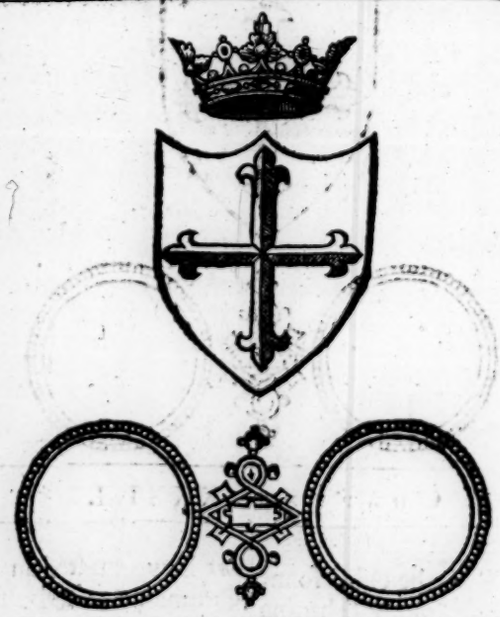
ETHELBERT THE TVVENTIETH ONE KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWO AND TWENTIETH Monarch of the Englishmen: his Raigne, and Issue.

Monarc. 22.



CHAPTER XXXIV.

An. Do. 860

Ethelbert, the second sonne of king Ethelwolf, who had succeeded his Vncle Ethelstan in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, Kentish, and East-Saxons, and for fiue yeares continuance, ruled those Countries with great equity and valour; after the decease of his brother Ethelbald, succeeded him also both in the West-Saxons Kingdome, and the whole Lands Monarchy: whereof he was the one and twentieth King, and the two and twentieth Monarch.

(2) His raigne began in the yeere after Christs natiuity, eight hundred sixty, and was disquieted from first to last by the inuasions of the bloudy Danes. For presently after his coronatiõ, these common enemies entred the Land, ruinating all before them vnto the Citie Winchester, which they sacked, and left it troden vnder their destroying feete, euen to the ground. But in their return were encountred by the Bark-shire-men, vnder the leading of Osrick, Earle of Hamptõ, by whom they were vanquished, the prey recouered red, and a great number of those Infidels slaine.

The Kentish-men compound for their peace.

(3) In his first yeare also a Nauie of Danes and Normans entred into the Iland Tanet, and began their wonted spoiles among those people: whereupon the Kentish compounded their peace for a great sum of money giuen. Notwithstanding these miscreants, which knew not God, gaue little regard to their promised couenants, and before the dayes of truce were expired, like a sudden floud ouer-bare all before them. These their irruptions to withstand, the Kentish then prepared, rather aduenturing themselues, vpon the chance of battle, then to rest vpon a seeming truce, wherein their destruction was too apparant; and forthwith assembling all their powers together, set vpon those truce-breakers, and with much slaughter forced them at length out of their Country.

Ethelberts time of raigning.

(4) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, he yeelded his body to the course of nature, and his Kingdomes to his next brother, after he had raigned ouer the Kentish, South, and East-Saxons, the terme of ten yeares, and had sate Monarch of the whole onely fiue. He dyed the yeare of grace eight hundred sixtie six, and was honourably buryed in the Cathedrall Church of Shirborne in Dorsetshire, by his brother King Ethelbald.

His supposed Issue.

Athelm the eldest sonne.

(5) Athelm, the brothers sonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the last will and testament of the same King, seemeth by all likelihood to be the eldest sonne of this King Ethelbert, elder brother to the same King Elfred, although hee succeeded not his Father in his Kingdome. For in those dayes, if the Kings sonnes were vnder age, the succession went to the next brother, and if that brother left his sonne at full age, then it went vnto him; otherwise it reuerted to the elder brothers sonne.

Ethelwald the second sonne.

(6) Ethelwald, surnamed Clito, which is a word of addition giuen to all the Saxon Kings sonnes of England, is mentioned in King Elfreds will to be his brothers sonne, and is most likely to be the sonne of this King Ethelbert: he prooued a most deadly enemy to his cosen King Edward, the sonne of King Elfred his Vncle, destroying his Townes in Dorsetshire; & being driuen out of England, ioyned himselfe with the Danes, who made him their King in Northumberland, and vnder his leading, grieuously assailed the Countries of the East-Saxōs, East-Angles, and Mercians; wherein he was lastly slaine, the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and fiue, being the fourth of King Edward his cosen-germans raigne.

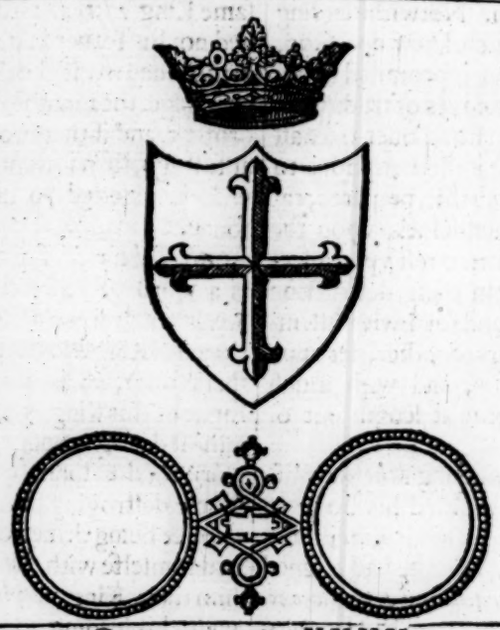
ETHELRED

Ethelred.

ETHELRED THE TVVO AND TWENTIETH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY THIRD MONARCH of the Engliſh-men, his Acts, and Iſſue.

Monarc. 23.



CHAPTER XXXV.

An. Do. 866

Ethelred, the third ſon of King Ethelwolfe, after the deceaſe of his brother ſucceeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty third Monarch of the Engliſh-men, he beganne his raigne in the yeare of our ſaluation eight hundred ſixty and ſix, and for the time that he was King, raigned in continuall Warres againſt the Pagan Danes, whoſe numbers now were greater, and footing ſurer in this land then formerly had bin.

Hungar and Hubba.

(2) In the firſt yeare of his raigne, there arriued vpon the Engliſh coaſts a huge Army of theſe Danes, whereof Hungar and Hubba, men of incredible ſtrength and crueltie, were the Captaines: Theſe wintred in Eaſt-Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants vpon certaine conditions, and forebare a time from their wonted rauening.

(3) But in the next yeare, the King being buſied to put backe a freſh inrode of Danes in the South and Weſt of the Iland then entred; theſe deuourers tooke aduantage vpon the ciuill broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in theſe turmoiled times ſought to withdraw their ſubiection from the Weſt-Saxons, and to ſet vp Kings againe of their owne. The foreſaid Captaines Hungar and Hubba, hauing in time of their truce ſtrengthned themſelues with new ſupplies of ayde, marched further into the North, where finding the people vnprouided of ſtrength, and the two Kings Oſbright and Ella of reconciled enemies to be made no ſure friends, they harried the Country before them, and entring Yorke ſlew the two Kings, with infinite number of the Engliſh; which Citie they conſumed with fire, and burnt therein all thoſe that had fled thither for ſuccour.

The Danes March Northward.

(4) The State thus ſtanding, and their forces increaſing euery day, brought new feares vpon the Inhabitants, when euery late victory with increaſe of Captiues and rich ſpoiles, miniſtred occaſion and meanes of ſome other Conqueſt to follow; which theſe Pagans ſo purſued, till laſtly they ſet a ſubſtitute King to raigne vnder them, ouer all the North Borders beyond the Riuer Tyne; and ſo retyring themſelues out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which Citie they won, and therein wintred the third of King Ethelreds raigne, who with the ayd of Burthred the Mercian King, conſtrained the Danes to ſue for peace, and ſafe departure, yeelding the Citie, and againe retyring themſelues ouer Tyne, re-remained in Yorke all the next Winter.

An. Do. 870 (5) The Summers opportunity approching, their wonted desire for spoyle was with it increased, & to cut off long trauel, these Danes by Boates passed Humber, where Hungar and Hubba began with fire and sword to lay all waste before them, sparing neither Person, sexe, nor age. The places respected for publike good, & sacred Temples consecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants haue forborne, these sauage men as the earths destroyers cast down and trampled vnder their prophane feete: among which for note were the goodly monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Huntington, all laid in leuell with the ground, and their Votaries, aswell the Nunnes as the Monks, murthered with their vnhumane & mercilesse swords; to auoid whose barbarous pollutions, the chast Nunnes of Coldingham deformed themselues to their lasciuious eyes, by cutting off their vpper lips and noses; but to euerlasting remembrance they remaine most faire, and well beseeming faces of pure Virgins.

Florit. Histor.

(6) These Pagans piercing further into the land, came into the territories of the East-Angles, wherein holy Edmund raigned King, whose Martyrdome in most cruel manner they wrought, he constantly calling vpon the name of Christ, whereof we haue already spoken, and shall be occasioned hereafter to speake.

(7) But in the last yeare of this Kings raign, their raging power was most great: for with a new supply, two Danish Kings, Streeg, and Halden, entred into West-Saxia, and at Reading the Kings Towne intrenched themselues: these forraging the Country, were encountred with at Englefield by Ethelwolfe Earle of Barkeshire, and his men, who in skirmish slew one of their Leaders; and chased the rest backe to their Trench.

(8) These Danes fearing least delayes would proue dangerous, and knowing that the first successe is commonly seconded with further courage of hope; foure dayes after shewed themselues in field ready to fight: their Hoast they diuided into two battalians; whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings, and certaine Earles were Leaders of the other; which when the English perceiued, they also diuided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the first, and Elfred his brother was Generall of the second; the place was Assendon, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for battle: King Ethelred in his Tent stayd so long in prayers, that Elfred vpon a forward courage hasted to encounter the enemy, and that with a most fierce and sharpe fight, wherein hauing spent the most of his strengths, and ready to decline, and giue backe: Ethelred manfully entred the battaile, and so seconded his brother, & ouer-tyred Souldiers, that he made way by dint of his sword through the thickest of their almost-Conquering enemies, and with such losse of the Danish bloud, drawne from the sides of one of their Kings, fiue Earles, & an infinite number of the common Souldiers, that the streames thereof seemed as an ouer-swelling tyde, altogether to couer the face of the field, and is accounted for the noblest victory that the English till then had gotten of the Danes.

Assendon battle.

Scala Chron.

(9) Yet were not these Pagans therewith discouraged, but gathering more strengths and supplies from other parts; fourteene dayes after, made head againe against the English, and pitching downe their Standards at Basing, abode the comming of Ethelred & tryall of battle: wherin successe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was discomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

Basing battle.

(10) Thus both sides borne vpon rage and hope, in their heate of bloud prepare for new fight. The Danes power was augmented with a further supply sent from beyond Seas, and the English confirmed with hope of Successe: These meeting at Merton (two moneths after the battaile of Basing) encountred each others both boldly and bloudily; wherein at first the English preuailed, and the Danes were chased; but their numbers the greater, and fresh supply maintaining their battaile, they recouered themselues, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred receiued his deaths wound, with such slaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters, to haue been afterwards attempted any more by the English.

Polydore Virg.

(11) Great was the valour and resistance of this King; for in his short time of Raigne as Writers record, no lesse then nine set battailes against the Danes he fought in one yeare, to the great effusion of Christian bloud, and to no little losse of the Danish power; for in his raigne fell of them one King, nine Earles, and of the common sort without number.

His Issue.

Elfred the eldest sonne.

Elfred, the eldest son of King Ethelred seemeth to be Grandfather to the noble and learned Ethelward, who being kinsman, Counsellor, and Treasurer to King Edgar, wrote an history of his Country, beginning at the first arriuall of the Saxons into England, and continuing vnto his own time: which history he dedicated to his kinswoman, and cosen-germane the Lady Maude Abbesse of Quedlingburg in Saxony, being the daughter of the Emperour Otho, by Edgith his Wife, daughter of King Edward the elder, and sister of Ethelstane and Edmund, Kings of England,

Oswald a yonger sonne.

Oswald, a yong son of King Ethelred, is mentioned in a Charter of his Fathers, by which he gaue Lands to the Monastery of Abington neere Oxford; and to which this sonne of his hath his name set downe for a witnes; which Charter is yet extant, recorded in a great Legier-booke, & Register of the Euidences of the lands, sometime belonging to the said Monastery.

Thyre a daughter.

Thyre, the daughter of King Ethelred, is reported by the histories of Ireland to be married to Gormon King of the Danes, and to haue had issue King Harald, which Harald, by Queen Gonhild his wife, had issue Sweyn King of Denmarke, Iringe King of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. King Sweyne by Queene Sigred his wife, had issue Cnute King of England and Denmarke, Ostryde wife of Duke Wolfe, and mother of King Sweyne the younger, and Thyre the first wife of Earle Goodwin of Kent.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Marianus. Florentius.

Elfred, or Alfred, the fourth son of King Ethelwolfe, though he had beene annointed King at Rome by Pope Leo in his yong yeares and fathers life time, yet raigned he in no part of his Dominions, before the deaths of all his Brethren, vnder whom he serued in most of their warres, assisting them likewise in all their counsels. The land now miserably torne by the cruell cruell incurſions of the bloudy Danes was left vnto him, both to redeeme, and to raigne ouer, by the death and Teſtament of King Ethelred his laſt brother.

(2) He began his raigne in the yeare of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God eight hundred ſeuenty two, being crowned in the City of Wincheſter, the twentie third King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twẽty fourth Monarch of the Engliſhmen: but of ſome Hiſtorians he is famouſed by the ſtile of the firſt abſolute Monarch.

(3) His raigne beganne with troubles and warres in defence of the Land which the Pagan Danes intended to deſtroy; and though his powers were ſmall, yet was he forced into the field within one moneth after his Coronation; the place was Wilton in the Countie of Wilt-ſhire, on the South-banke of the Riuer wily: where the Danes at firſt gaue backe and fled. But ſeeing the fewnes of their purſuers, reenforced their battle, and got the field, with whom the weſt-Saxons entred league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

(4) Theſe Rouers then with their aſſociates at Reading, got themſelues into London, where they wintred; with whom the Mercians likewiſe compounded for their peace; which proued ſhortly to be the deſtruction of their Princely bloud; and laſtly, the Lands ſubuerſion by a forraine Nation. For the Danes hauing got footing in the North, the weſt, and the South of this land, (vnto whoſe ayd many newcome gueſts from their Eaſterne Countries were arriued vnder the leading of other three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond) all together ſet their griping tallents with ſuch faſt hold vpon Mercia, that at Ripendon they cõſtrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elſwith out of the land, and in his ſtead placed a King of their owne choiſe, vpon condition to deliuer vp the ſame againe vnto them when they would demand it.

Mat. Weſtmin.

Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 1.

An.Do.875 (5) In the fourth yeare of King Elfred their armies diuided themſelues into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland; where he beſtowed that Country among his followers, and therein remained for two yeares continuance, doing much harme both to the Engliſh and Picts. The other part led by the laſt new-come King, came to Grandbridge, where they wintered aud ſpoyled the Country, and there ſpreading themſelues as Graſhoppers vpon the face of the earth, eate vp all where they came; ſo that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his Kingdome Weſt-Saxia; to which Couenants they promiſed and ſwore; yet contrary to both, tooke into Deuon-ſhire, and wintred at Exceſter: vnto whom a further ſupply by Sea ſought to ioyne themſelues, but met with ſuch boiſterous blaſts, that one hundred and twentie of their ſhips were caſt away by tempeſt at Swanwicke vpon our Coaſts, and their land-army marching towards Exceſter, were there welcommed with ſo ſharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gaue him both pledges and oath to depart with all ſpeed.

Elfreds compoſition.

(6) But Fortune euer dallying with them whom ſhee meanes to down-caſt, ſet the chance of loſſe preſently vpon the Saxons ſide: for now the three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond thought it not good to let Elfred thus reſt, and thereupon drew their forces weſtwards towards him, where at Chipingham (a Mannor of his) they wintered, and compelled the Weſt-Saxons there, either to yeeld, or to forſake the Country.

Three Kings againſt Elfred.

An.Do.876 (7) King Elfred therefore, with ſuch ſtrength as he had, haſted towards them, and ſeuenteene miles from Briſtow pitched downe his tents euen in the face of the enemy; where betwixt theſe fierce Nations a great Battaile was fought, to the infinite loſſe of bloud on both ſides, and that vpon ſuch equall departure, as neither could challenge to be maſters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was diſcomfited, which turned greatly to his aduantage; for thereupon many of the Engliſh haſted to his ſuccour, leſt the ouerthrow of him ſhould be the bane of them all: his ſtrengthes thus renued with an vnexpected ſupply, no time was detracted to ſtay the Daniſh rage, who were now returned further into the heart of the land, & at Abington by Oxford had pitched their Standards for fight.

Abington.

(8) Thither the Engliſh repaired, and the next morning Elfred ordered his Army; neither were the enemies vnprepared, but with braues ſtood ready to receiue the encounter. The battaile ioyned, continued with ſuch loſſe of bloud, that it is accounted one of the foreſt that euer betwixt them before had beene fought, and onely parted by the approach of the night, neither party challenging the honour of the day, the loſſe being ſo great vpon both ſides.

be fought in that yeare, whereby both their ſtrengths were much abated, and their ſpilt bloud ſo cooled their liuers; that laſtly they concluded vpon a peace: one article was this, that the Danes ſhould admit no more of their nation to arriue in this Iland: but how ſoone that was broken, the ſequels did ſhew.

An. Do. 876 Simon Dunel.

(9) For in the yeare eight hundred ſeuenty ſix (ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis) Rollo a noble man of Denmarke with a great army entred into England, with no leſſe ſpoile & deſtruction then other of thoſe Danes before him had done, notwithſtanding the truce: with whom King Elfred met, and gaue him ſo hot welcome, that he liked not greatly his entertainement; and being warned (forſooth) in his ſleepe that better fortune attēded him in France, he left his Country-men to tugge with the Engliſh.

Elfrids exigents.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hiue, infeſt all the land, in ſo much that this vndaunted King Elfred was oft times brought to ſuch extremities, that he hid himſelfe out of ſight, and in the Fennes and Marſh grounds was forced with ſuch ſmall companies as he had, to liue by fiſhing, fowling, and hunting of wilde beaſts for his food, hauing no more of his great Monarchy left him but Somerſet, Hampton, and Wiltſhires only, neither yet them free from the incurſions of the Danes.

Edelingſey Iland.

(11) The ſolitary place of his moſt reſidency, was an Iland incloſed with the two Riuers, Thone and Parret, at their meeting in the Countie of Sommerſet, commonly called Edelingſey, where he in very poore attire diſguiſed, was entertained into a Cowheards houſe (if not into his ſeruice) where on a time as he ſate by the fire in trimming of his bow and ſhafts, a cake of dow baking vpon the hearth before him, chanced to burne; the Cowheardeſſe comming in, and ſeeing him mind more his bow then his bread, in a great fury caſt away both his bow and arrowes, and checking him as her Groom, ſaid, Thou fellow, doeſt thou ſee the bread burne before thy face, & wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eate it before it be halfe baked? Little ſuſpecting him to be the man that had beene ſerued with farre more delicate cates.

(12) But this Prince, the very mirrour of Princes, more minding the wealth of his Subiects, then the maieſtie of State, diſguiſed himſelfe in the habit of a common Minſtrell, and in perſon repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Senacheribs, wallowing in wantonneſſe, and ſecure in their owne conceit from impeach of danger; which Elfred a moſt skilfull Muſitian, and an excellent Poet, did not a little egge on by his ſweete muſicke, and ſongs of their valour, ſo that he was ſuffered to paſſe vncontrolled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or elſewhere: whereby he both ſaw their negligent ſecuritie, and by diligent obſeruance learned the deſignes that in their counſels they entended.

(13) Returning to his comfortleſſe company, he told them the condition of the hoſtile Camp, and how eaſie it was to recouer againe their decayed eſtates: whereupon ſhewing himſelfe to his Subiects, vnto whoſe ſight nothing could be more ioyous, on the ſuddaine ſet vpon the careleſſe Camp of the Danes, and made thereof a very great ſlaughter, to the great terrour of others in other parts, that had accounted him dead long before.

(14) Hubba, that had harried the Engliſh, and now rouzed vpon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life; with thirtie three ſhips ſailed from Wales, and arriuing in the mouth of Tau, where it falleth into the Seuerne Sea, aſſayed to take there the then-ſtrong Caſtle called Kinwith, vnto whom the Deuon-ſhire men gaue battle, and ſlew eight hundred and eightie perſons of their retinue; where dyed the Daniſh King Hubba, whoſe corpſe being there interred vnder a great heape of copped ſtones, gaue name to the place, and was called Hubbleſtone. There and then was takē the Daniſh much eſteemed Banner, called Reafan, wherein a Rauen was purtraied wrought in needle-worke, (ſo Aſſerius Menenenſis reporteth) by the three ſiſters of Hubba and Hungar the daughters of Lothbroke (that is, Leatherbreach) the Dane: In regard whereof, as alſo for the opinion of good luck, as they tooke it, it was euer borne before them in their warres.

(15) Theſe aduerſe proceedings of the Danes deſignes, eſpecially falling when the game was neere wonne, made them ſuſpect, how faire ſoeuer the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would ſerue it in the end to their loſſe: for Elfred now flocked vnto vpon euery ſide, began to build Fortreſſes behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering ſword: whereupon the Danes ſent to him for Peace, and deliuered him hoſtages, vpon aſſurance that they meant as they ſpake:

Danes ſend for peace.

ſpake: The Conditions were, that their King ſhould receiue Baptiſme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the Land.

(16) Whereupon Gurmund or Gurthrun the Daniſh king repaired to the new built Caſtle of Edelingſey vnto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was waſhed in the lauer of Baptiſme, whom Elfred receiued for his God-ſon by the name of Athelſtane, and gaue him in free gift the Country of Eaſt-Angles. In the ſame fountaine of grace (ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis) thirty of the chiefe Daniſh Nobility were initiated: vpon whom the truly Chriſtian King Elfred beſtowed many rich gifts: And that the limits of the Engliſh might be free from their Incurſions, thus the confines of King Elfreds Kingdome were laide forth, as we finde it in the end of thoſe Lawes that Elfred publiſhed, whoſe words are theſe: Let the bounds of our Dominion ſtretch from the riuer Thamiſis, and from thence to the water of Lea, euen vnto the head of the ſame water, and ſo forth ſtraight vnto Bedford: and finally, going along by the Riuer of Ouſe, let them end at Watling-ſtreet.

(17) But ſo farre were the Danes from performance of Couenants, that in this eight yeare of King Elfreds raigne, and the eight hundred ſeuentie nine after Chriſt, this Gurmund and his company wintered at Chipnam in Wiltſhire, and a new ſupply of theſe Pagans (knowne by the name of the Wiccings) wintred at Fulham neere London; yet after vpon better aduice, the one went into their aſſigned circuit, & the other departed to the Realme of France; and ſo to his twelfth yeare the Land tooke ſome reſt, that had been kept long waking by the loud ſound of warre.

(18) In the yeare of Grace eight hundred eighty fiue, theſe laſt retired Danes finding France not fitting their purpoſe, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, where on his Eaſt ſide they began a fierce ſiege vnto the Citie Rocheſter, before whoſe gate they built a ſtrong Caſtle: Thither King Elfred haſted, before whoſe power theſe Danes could not ſtand, but were forced to their ſhippes, and backe againe into France.

(19) Whereupon the King remoued his ſiege vnto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Wolues abide not the preſence of the Lyon,) the inhabitants reioycing to ſee the face of their King: which Citie he reſtored to her former libertie and beautie, and committed the cuſtody therof vnto Ethelred Duke of Mercia, that had maried his daughter the Lady Ethelfred, whoſe title the King had maintained againſt Colwolphus, made King thereof by the Danes. Wherupõ both Kent, the South Saxons, & Weſt-Saxons came willingly, & ſubmitted themſelues to King Elfred. The Eaſt-Angles being gouerned, or rather ſpoiled by Athelſtan the Chriſtned Dane, who after twelue yeres raign there dyed, and was buryed at Hadley in Suffolke.

(20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, & of Chriſts Incarnation 892. thoſe rouing Danes returned out of Frãce and againe arriued in Kent, in the mouth of the Riuer Limen, with two hundred & fiftie ſhips, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andreads Weald, and there deſtroyed a Caſtle that ſtood for defence, building another more ſtrong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the ſame time likewiſe entred one Haſtings, a Nobleman of Norway, with 80. ſhips; but with a fairer ſhew as hee entended, for he ſent his oath vnto Elfred not to annoy any part of his Dominions, and withall his two ſonnes ſo be baptized: which King Elfred accepted, himſelfe becomming the God-father of the one, and Duke Ethelred of the other; and both they, and his Ambaſſadors returned with rich gifts. Againſt theſe Kentiſh inuaders, King Elfred fought a great battaile at Fernham, neere vnto Aelefford, wherein he wounded their King, & forced his Armie to flee ouer Thameſis; in paſſing whereof, through ouermuch haſt and great feare, many of them were drowned, and they that eſcaped, fled to an Iland called Brekleſey, incloſed about by the Riuer Colne.

(21) Newes then being brought into the Eaſt, that the Danes from Northumberland had infeſted the Weſt, and with a ſtrong ſiege begirt the Citie Exceſter: Elfred left for Generall his ſon in law Duke Ethelred, whileſt he with a ſtrong power went to ſuppreſſe their rage: who hearing of his cõming, brake vp their ſiege, and were gone. Vpon the aduantage of his abſence, periured Haſtings then wrought, who out of his new built Caſtle at Beamfield, made ſpoyle of the Kings people; and forraged all the Country before him. Whereupon Duke Ethelred aſſembled a power, & firſt aſſailing his well ſtored Caſtle, tooke thence his wife and two ſonnes, with exceeding ſpoyles of gold, ſiluer, and garments; all which were preſented vnto King Elfred at his retur-

But the country Inhabitants comming to the reſcue, begirt them about with their hoaſt, and foreſtalled the paſſages of all ſupply of victuals; ſo that for want of food, the Danes were conſtrained to eate vp their horſes, and vpon compoſition thence to depart.

(23) Thence fetching a compaſſe all along the Coaſts of Wales, in the ſame yeare they arriued in Eſſex, being the twenty foure of King Elfreds raigne: and in the winter following, drew their ſhips by the Thameſis into the Riuer Lea, by which they paſſed in thoſe light Pinnaces twentie miles North-ward into the land, and built them a fortreſſe at the place called * Weare: thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his tents before his enemies in the ſame place; who ſeeing their ſtrength, and the danger of long ſiege, did that by policy, which power could not ſo ſuddenly doe: for he diuided the riuer into ſundry ſtreames, whereby the Chanell was made vnnauigable, and the Shippes bedded in the mudde, lay rather to their annoyance then defence. The former experience of their hunger-ſtarued beſiege made them more fearfull to fall into the like; and therefore in great haſte departed their Fortreſſe, leauing their wiues and children to the mercy of the Engliſh. Neither ſtayed they till they came vnto the borders of Wales, when at Cartbridge vpon Seuerne they built another Caſtle, and lay there all the next Winter.

(24) Long there they ſtayed not, without diſlike of their lodgings and cold entertainments, but that they returned to their wonted ſpoiles, and diuided themſelues, ſome to Northumberland, and ſome into Eaſt-Anglia, like Locuſts eate vp all as they went: whoſe breath as it were, ſo infected the aire, that for three yeeres following a great mortalitie raigned both vpon men and beaſts, & ended not much before the death of this incomparable Prince: which hapned to the great ſorrow of his ſubiects vpon wedneſday the twenty eight of October, when he had raigned twenty nine yeares and ſix moneths, of his age fifty one, and yere of Chriſt Ieſus nine hundreth and one.

(25). The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that euer raigned before him, and exceed the moſt that euer raigned after him, both in ſeruice of God, whoſe Subſtitutes they are; in defence of his country, which charge they all beare; in prouiding good lawes, the ſinewes of Kingdomes, and care of poſterities, from which no man is exempted.

The day and night containing twentie foure houres, hee deſigned equally to three eſpeciall vſes, and them obſerued by the burning of a taper ſet in his Chappell or Oratory; eight houres he ſpent in contemplation, reading and prayers; eight, in prouiſion for himſelfe, his repoſe and health; and the other eight in the affayres of his Common-wealth and ſtate. His Kingdome he likewiſe diuided into Shires, Hundreds, and Tithings, for the better ordering and adminiſtring of iuſtice, and for the abandoning of theeues, which had formerly increaſed by the meanes of long warres; whereby, notwithſtanding the multitude of Souldiers continually imployed, it is reported that a Virgin might trauaile alone in his dayes through all his Dominions, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hanged in the high wayes, and no man ſo hardy as to take them away.

Hee was a moſt zealous, and ſtudious protector and prouider for the Clergie, Widdowes, and Orphans, liberall of his goods, wiſe, temperate, and iuſt, valiant, patient in aduerſities, and euer religious in the ſeruice of God. A moſt learned Prince, a skilfull Muſition, and an excellent Poet: the beſt Lawes befitting his Subiects hee tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue: as alſo the Paſtorall of Gregory, the hiſtory of Beda, and Boetius his Conſolation of Philoſophy; the Pſalmes of Dauid (whoſe godly raigne he propoſed to himſelfe for imitation) he likewiſe began to tranſlate, but dyed before he could finiſh the ſame. (26) His body was firſt buried in the Cathedrall Church of S. Peters at Wincheſter, vnder a faire Monument of moſt pretious Porphyry, afterwards becauſe the lewd-religious Chanons gaue it out (to worke ſome feat of their vſuall impoſture) that his Ghoſt did walke euery night from houſe to houſe; both it and the Monument were taken vp, & by his ſon the Kings command (in deteſtation of thoſe ſorceries) remooued into the Church of the new Monaſtery: and laſtly, his body, Monument, Church, and Monaſtery, were taken thence, and remoued without the North gate of the City, ſince called Hyde.

(27) Some alledge that the malice of thoſe Chanons againſt him, was for diſpleaſure that he placed ouer them a rude Swineheard named Denewlphus, whom he made their Biſhop; but the ground of that aſſertion ſeemeth vnwarrantable by the relation of Wigornenſis, and alſo of Tho. Rudburne; the firſt of which ſaith, that Elfred cauſed him to be trained vp in learning, and the later, that after long ſtudy, he attained to the degree of a Doctor of Diuinitie in the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, and was afterward made Biſhop of Wincheſter by the King. For doubtles at that time the Biſhops of Rome had not deueſted our Kings of that prerogatiue.

His Wife.

(28) Elſwith the Wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred, ſurnamed Muchel, that is, the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gainesborough in Lincoln-ſhire: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Bloud-roiall of Mercia. She was maried vnto this King in the twentieth yeare of his age, being the ſecond of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred; and was his wife twentie eight yeares, and liuing after him foure; dyed in the yeare of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monaſtery of Nunnes which ſhe had founded at Wincheſter; out of which afterwards King Henry the firſt tooke to his wife Maud the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots, by whom the royall bloud of the ancient Kings of England became vnited to the Normans, whereby he wonne much loue of the Engliſh Nation.

His Iſſue.

Edward, the eldeſt ſonne, and ſecond childe of King Elfred, and Queene Elſwith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred ſeuenty one: he was brought vp in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, & inſtructed by men of great vertue and knowledge, in learning, and in all other qualities, and exerciſes conuenient for Princes. He was maried, and had diuers children: being thirtie yeares of age before his Father deceaſed, and then ſucceeded him in his Kingdome and Monarchy.

Edward the eldeſt ſonne.

Ethelward, the ſecond ſon, and fifth, and laſt child of King Elfred and Queene Elſwith, was borne about the midſt of his Fathers raigne, and about the yere of our Lord eight hundred and eighty. He was in his youth by his fathers appointment, and for the example of other young Nobles, brought vp in the ſtudy of good Arts, at the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, where (ſaith Tho. Rudborne, and the Annales of Wincheſter) he became a man very learned and a great Philoſopher: he had of his fathers gift by his laſt will great liuings in the Counties of Deuon, Somerſet, South-Hampton: he proued a man of great iudgment and wiſedome, and liuing vntill he was aboue fortie yeares old; he died the ſixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yere of his brother King Edwards raigne, Anno nine hundred twentie two, and was buried at Wincheſter.

child of King Elfred, and Queene Elſwith his wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in reſpect of his marriage was ſuffered to haue all royall iuriſdictiō ouer that Country, in as ample manner as the Kings thereof had enioyed; and after the deceaſe of her husband, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 912. ſhee continued the Gouernment in the ſame ſort 8. yeres, with ſuch reſolution & valiant reſiſtance of the common enemy (the Danes) that ſhee ſtood her brother Edward in great ſtead, as in the relation of his life ſhall be further ſhewed. She died the fifteenth of Iune 919. and was buried in S. Peters Church at Glouceſter, leauing iſſue, a daughter, named Elſwin, whom King Edward her brother depriued of that Duchy which her owne mother enioyed, and he his Crowne by her aſſiſtance.

Ethelgeda the ſecond daughter.

Ethelgeda, the ſecond daughter & fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elſwith, was neuer married, but tooke vpon her the profeſſion and vow of Virginitie, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaftsbury in the Countie of Dorſet, in the Monaſtery there founded by him: who is alſo accounted the firſt of the Towne it ſelfe. Shee was afterward Abbeſſe of the houſe, and therein ſpent, and ended her life, and was there alſo buried.

Elfride the yongeſt daughter.

Elfride, the yongeſt daughter, and childe of King Elfred and Queene Elſwith his wife, was married to Baldwin the ſecond, ſurnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, ſon of Earle Baldwin the firſt, and Queene Iudith his wife, the widdow of King Ethelwolfe her Grandfather. Shee was his wife thirty yeeres and more; ſhee ſuruiued him and was a widdow eleuen yeeres: ſhe died the ſeuenth of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelſtan her Nephew. Shee is buried by her husband in the Chappell of our Lady, within the Monaſtery of S. Peter, at the Citie of Gaunt. CHAPTER XXXVII.

An. Do. 901

NO greater were the griefes conceiued for the death of worthy Elfred, then were ỹ hopes of the people in his ſonne Prince Edward, whoſe valour had beene often approued againſt the raging Danes, and whoſe vertues were both many and Princely; not ſo learned as his Father, neither ſo patiēt to vndergoe his chance, but as glorious in martiall proweſſe, and as

as fortunate in all his fights; vnder whose hand the Danes euery where fell, and vnder his Monarchy all the English did stoope, excepting the Northumbrians.

Speculum hist. Rec. Cicen. John Stow.

(2) He entred his raigne the yeare of Christs Natiuitie, nine hundred and one, and at Kingston vpon Thames was crowned and annointed with holy Oyle. The Danish warres continuing in a successiue manner, fell as it were hereditarily from the Father vnto the Sonne, and ripened daily towards their wished harueſt. Besides Ethelwald the sonne of Ethelbert the Vncle to this King Edward, young at his Fathers decease, and therefore perhaps held vncapable of gouernment, shewed now ỳ blossoms of vnder-sucking plants, whose fruits are neither plenteous nor pleasant in taste; for his humours euer working vpon discontents, drew his thought onely how to make the possessor fall.

Ethelwald his minoritie.

Winborne taken by him.

(3) He then entring action of rebellion, tooke the Towne of Winborne neere vnto Bathe, and besides the allegiance due to his Prince, in sacrilegious manner brake the hests of holy Church, in deflowring and taking a Votarist to wife. Edward the elder, so called (it may be in regard of this his Opposite) with a selected Army repaired to Bathe, and thence prepared for the field: whose sight was so cockatrice-like to his cosen-germans eye, that in the night he bade his Nun & Winborne adew, posting to Northumberland, and proffering his seruice to the Danes that lay for aduantage of rapine and spoile.

Henry Hunt.

(4) Him as a fit instrument they created their King, and forward in hope of some prosperous successe, passed through the East Saxons, the East-Angles, and the Mercians Countries: and laden with robberies came to Crikelade in Wilt-shire, whence they departed ouer Thamisis to Basingstoke; and harrying the land before them, with triumph returned vnto East-Anglia. Edward thus endangered by these dreadfull enemies, gaue them no aduantage by lingering delayes, but followed their tract vnto S. Edmunds Ditch, whence in his returne, the Danes gaue him battaile, and obtained the victory, though bought with the liues of Ethelwald and Cochricus their Kings, and losse of many English, which made Edward the readier to enter a truce with them about the fift of his Raigne.

(5) That the English were most expert for warre in these dayes, is witnessed by their resistance of those sturdy Danes, against whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King or Captaine to guide them: and they were likewise famous in other lands: for about this time it was, that the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great Citie Argilla in Barbary, which they won with such slaughter of the enemy, and spoyle of the towne; that for thirty yeres after it lay desolate without inhabitãts, wherby it was hoped that the Saracens would haue departed Europe, as Ioannes Leo Afer hath told vs, who according to the Saracens doth referre this siege to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Hegira, which meeteth with the yeare of Christs Natiuitie, nine hundred and fiue.

Ioannes Leo Apher in descript. Affric. lib. 3.

(6) The truce yet lasting, the Danes in Northumberland were nothing quiet, to stay whose irruptions King Edward sent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much slaughter returned victorious. These dalliances of Fortune made the Danes very desperate, and therefore to stay the rowling ball before it should passe their goale, they gathered their powers and entred Mercia, where with victory & spoyle they raged for a time. But Edward to ayd Ethelred his brother in law, & Earle of that Prouince, mustered his men, & at Wodnesfield neere Wolfrune-hampton in Stafford-shire gaue them battaile, wherein the English so behaued themselues that the two Pagan Kings Cowilfus and Healidine, the two Earles Vter and Scurfa, besides other Nobles & Cõmons innumerable they slew: and now the clouds of these distemperatures being driuen backe, King Edwards Monarchy ascended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power beganne to shine very bright, therefore he seeking to hold what he had got, set his thoughts to secure his towns with Castles & walles of defence.

The Danes breake truce with the English.

(7) These his proceedings caused him to be both beloued and feared; but his mind still free from any ambitions pride, as may appeare by the intercourse betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales & himselfe, whereof Wal. Mapæus maketh mention as followeth. What time Edward the Elder (saith he) lay at Austeline, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethesley, intending a Parly, Leolin refused to come downe, or to crosse the Seuerne: Whereupon Edward tooke boat and entred the riuer towards him, which when Leolin saw, and knew who he was, he cast off his rich robe wherwith he was clad, & which he had prepared for that roiall aſſembly, and entred the Riuer breaſt-hie, where claſping the boat with an imbrace, ſubmiſſiuely ſaid: Moſt wiſe and ſage King, thy humilitie hath ouercome my inſolency, and thy wiſedome triumphed ouer my folly; come, get vpon my necke, which I haue (foole as I am) lifted vp againſt thee, ſo ſhalt thou enter into that land which thy benigne mildnes hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him vpon his ſhoulders, he would needs haue him ſit downe vpon his royall roabe and ſo putting his hands ioyntly into his, did him homage.

Henry Hunt. An. Do. 912.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it; Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Elfleda King Edwards ſiſter, departed this life, ſhe hauing borne him one onely daughter named Elfwen, whoſe trauell in childbirth was ſo grieuous, that euer after ſhe forbare the nuptiall imbracements of her husband, alledging that it was an ouer-fooliſh pleaſure, which brought with it ſo great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted Affection of her ſexe from the bed vnto battaile, gouerned Mercia eight yeares after her husbands deceaſe, as another Zenobia, and did not a little aſſiſt her brother in his Warres: for the Welſh ſhee purſued as farre as Breknoke, which ſhee tooke with their Queene: from the Danes ſhee won the Countie of Darby, and aſſaulting the towne vpon them, put her ſelfe in great danger; for enterpriſing to enter the Gate, ſhee was reſiſted by whole multitudes of Danes; notwithſtanding, ſhee perſiſted, and got entrance, in which encounter many dyed, and foure of her chiefe men of warre, being Warders of her perſon, euen faſt by her ſide were ſlaine.

Elfleda diſlikes of vvedlocke.

She winneth Breknoke and Darby.

The Danes in Yorkſhire ſhe conſtrained to be at her deuotion, ſo that ſome of them became her ſubiects, ſome vowed to attend in her ayde, and ſome promiſed to be preſt at her diſpoſe. Her policie in warre proued euer the ſureſt; her counſell of State was regarded with the wiſeſt, and her prouidence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale-publike, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which ſhee extended vpon Cheſter, Tamworth, Lichfield, Stafford, Warwicke, Shrewsbury, Wednesbury, Eadsbury, Finborow, Rimcorne, Brimsbery Bridge, and others.

Many townes planted by her.

This renowned Lady giuing place vnto Nature, left the warres to be continued by her brother; her daughter at the diſpoſe of her Vncle, and her body to be buried at Gloceſter in the Monaſtery of S. Peter, which her husband and her ſelfe had formerly built.

(9) The laſt battaile of this King againſt theſe vnſatiate enemies, was in the Country of the Eaſt-Angles, whereof Edricke the Dane was King; for he intending new warres with the Engliſh, ſought to incite other Danes to his ayde, whereof Edward hauing intelligence, preuented his purpoſe, by his ſodaine approch into thoſe parts. Polydor.

Edricke therefore hauing all in a readineſſe, raſhly encountered with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great loſſe of his Army, and damage of his life; for returning to his Court after ſo foule a diſcomfiture, became odious to his owne ſubiects, who violently fell vpon him and murthered him; and themſelues brought low by ciuill diſſenſion were ſhortly made ſubiect to the Engliſh King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, ioyned vnto his Weſt-Saxons. And now hauing raigned in great warres and honour the ſpace of twentie foure yeares, deceaſed at Farringdon in Barkſhire, the yere of Chriſts incarnation, 924. and was buried in the New-Monaſtery of Wincheſter, which his Father begun, and himſelfe wholly finiſhed. Edricke his dounge.

(10) Eguina the firſt wife of King Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Bercher, whoſe eye-pleaſing feature and alluring beauty made her to be educated aboue the degree of her birth, and was brought vp by the nurſe of King Edward in tender affection and great eſteeme. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnes came to viſite his nurſe, where ſeeing the admirable beauty of the Maid, fell ſo farre in loue, that he tooke her to his Wife without the conſent or knowledge of his Father: In which regard ſhee is reputed by ſome Writers rather his Concubine then his Queene, no other cauſe mouing them but her meane parentage, and ſecret making and keeping of this marriage, although there be ſome good hiſtories and many likelihoods to induce that ſhe was his lawfull Queene. Eguina.

Prince Edward marrieth Eguina.

(11) Elfleda the ſecond wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelhelme, and Aſſer the Biſhop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wilt-ſhire among the Weſt-Saxons of the ſame name; who was in great fauour with Elfleda.

with King Elfred, the Father of this King, by whom he was ſent Ambaſſadour to carry his Almes to Stephen the ſixt of that name, Biſhop of Rome, in the yeare of our Lord 887. and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, he ſeemeth to be the man that was father to this Queene.

Stephen the ſixt Biſhop of Rome.

Edgina.

(12) Edgina, the third wife of King Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigeline Lord of Meapham, Culings, and Leanham in Kent, who was there ſlaine in battaile againſt the Danes, Anno 927. She was maried vnto King Edward about the fourteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. She was his wife ten yeares, & after his death ſhe liued a widow all the times of the raignes of King Ethelſtan her ſon in law, of King Edmund, and King Edred her owne ſonnes, of King Edwy her Grand-child; and was liuing in the raigne of King Edward another of her Grand-children, almoſt forty yeres after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. ſhee offered her lands and euidences to Chriſt vpon his Altar at Canterbury. Shee deceaſed the 25. of Auguſt in the fourth yere of the ſaid King Edgar, and of Chriſt, 963.

Two Kings her ſonnes.

His Children.

Ethelſtan the firſt ſonne.

(13) Ethelſtan, the eldeſt ſon of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, was borne and growne to good yeres in the time of the raigne of his Grand-father King Elfred, who with his owne hands gaue him the order of Knighthood, after a very honourable manner of creation, as William the Monk of Malmsbury, a great obſeruer of ſuch things, hath left in writing: who reporteth, that he put vpon him a Purple Robe, & girt him with a girdle wrought with pearle, and a Saxon ſword in a ſcabard of gold, hanging at the ſame. Hee was the Succeſſor of his Father in the Weſt-Saxons Dominions, and the Engliſh Monarchy.

Will. Malmesb.

Elfred the ſecond ſonne.

(14) Elfred, the ſecond ſon of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, is warranted by the teſtimony of the ſtory of Hyde, to haue bin loued of his Father aboue all his other children, that he cauſed him in his owne life time to be crowned King, and to ſit with him in his Seat of Eſtate, as his Partner in the Kingdome, and that he enioyed that great honour but for a ſmall time, deceaſing ſhortly after his creation; and long before his fathers death; & was buried in the New Monaſtery at Wincheſter; which was after remoued to Hyde.

Crowned king in his Fathers time.

Editha the firſt daughter.

(15) Editha (whom the Scottiſh Writers call Beatrice) the daughter of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, with great honor was maried to Sithricke, the Daniſh King of Northumberland, in the firſt yeare of the raigne of her brother King Ethelſtan, being the yeare of Grace 915. Within one yeare after her marriage, her huſband deceaſed, and his ſon Guthfrid ſucceeded him in his Kingdome. Wherefore ſhe forſaking that Country, obtained of her brothers gift, the Caſtle of Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke, where ſhee began a Monaſtery of Nunnes, and therein liued, died, and was interred, and both the Monaſtery and Body afterwards was remoued from thence vnto Polleſworth.

Elſward the third ſonne.

(16) Elſward, the third ſonne of King Edward, and the firſt of Queene Elfleda his ſecond wife, was borne, as it ſeemeth, about the beginning of his Fathers raigne. He was carefully brought vp in the ſtudie of Liberall Arts, and in all other princely qualities; ſo that it was expected he ſhould haue ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom: but preſently vpon his Fathers deceaſe, he deceaſed himſelf in Oxford, & was buried at one time, and in one place with him in the New Monaſtery at Wincheſter, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 924.

Edwine the fourth ſonne.

(17) Edwine, the fourth ſonne of King Edward, and the ſecond of Queene Elfleda his ſecond wife, was very yong when his Father was buried, and his brother Ethelſtane Crowned. Notwithſtanding, a deepe iealouſie poſſeſſing the King, that his title was too neere the Crowne, he cauſed him to be put into a little Pinneſſe, without either Tackle or Oares, one onely page accompanying him, that his death might be imputed to the waues: whence the yong Prince, ouercome with griefe, and not able to maſter his owne paſſions, caſt himſelfe headlong into the ſea, and his dead body being driuen vpon the coaſts of Flanders, was taken vp by Adulphe, Earle of Boloine, his coſengermane, and honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by King Ethelſtan, who grieuouſly puniſhed the ſuggeſtions of his owne iealouſie, & the procurers of his brothers death; ſending great thankes to the Earle that buried him, and rich Preſents to the Monaſtery which entombed him, and to appeaſe the ghoſt of his innocent brother built the Abbey of Midleton in the Countie of Dorſet.

(19) Eguina, the third daughter of King Edward, and the second of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, was the second Wife to Charles the third, surnamed the Simple, King of France, son to King Lewis the brother of Iudith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had issue by him Lewis the third, surnamed Beyond-sea, because he was brought vp here in England with his Vncle King Ethelstan; & Gillet Dutchesse of Normandy married to Rollo the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to be the first Duke of that Country. This Queene suruiued King Charles her husband; and afterwards was remarried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Vermandoys; which marriage was taken for so great an indignity, because Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had caused the King her Husband to die in prison, that King Lewis her sonne presently pursued her, apprehended, and committed her to the strait custody of Queene Gerberge his wife: so as shee had no recourse vnto him, nor issue by him.

Eguina the third daughter.

Her marriage with Herbert disliked.

(20) Ethelhild, the fourth daughter of King Edward, and the third of Queene Elfleda his second wife, followed the example of her eldest sister Elfleda, and became a Nun in the Monastery of Wilton, which was sometime the head Towne giuing name to the whole Countie of Wiltshire, and anciently called Ellandon.

Ethelhild the fourth daughter.

(21) Edhild, the fifth daughter of King Edward, and the fourth of Queen Elfleda, was married to Hugh surnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-master and Constable of France, in the yeare of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother King Ethelstanes raigne. This Hugh was the son of Robert, brother to Endes King of France, and father of King Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, euer sithence vnto this day: but shee died before him without any issue by him.

Edhild the fifth daughter.

(22) Edgith, the sixth daughter of King Edward, and the fifth of Queene Elfleda, was the first wife of Otho the first, surnamed the Great, Emperor of the West, son to the Emperor Henry, surnamed the Falconer. By him she had issue Ludolfe, Duke of Swabe, William Arch-bishop of Mentz, Ludgard married to Conrad Duke of Lorrayn, and Mechthild Abbesse of Quedlingburg in Saxonie: in which City she deceased the seuen & twenty of August, in the yeere of Christs Natiuitie 947. the eleuenth of her husbands Empire, and the first of her brother King Edreds raigne in England. She was buried at the East end of the North side of a Chapell which her selfe had founded in the same Citie.

Edgith the sixt daughter.

(23) Elgiua, the seuenth daughter of King Edward, and the sixth of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, was by King Ethelstan her brother, with her sister Egith, sent to the Court of the Emperour Henry the first, King of the Saxons in Germanie, who honorably entertained her, brought her vp with his owne daughters; and after he had married her elder sister to his eldest sonne, he placed her also in marriage with a Duke of Italy about the Alpes, who is not named of our Writers, but may easily be coniectured by the honourable disposition of the maker of the match, to haue beene a Prince of note and account, worthy of her estate and parentage.

Elgiua the seuenth daughter.

Married to a Duke of Italy.

(24) Edmund, the fifth son of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgiua his third and last Wife, was borne in the twentieth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, being the yeare of the worlds Saluation 921. and at his Fathers death little more then three yeres of age, was notwithstanding by the carefull prouision of his mother, brought vp with all princely education conuenient for his yeares and estate, insomuch as there was generally a great expectation amongst the people conceiued of him in the life of his brother King Ethelstan, vnder whom he learned some experience of seruice in warre, and after whom he succeeded in the Kingdome of England.

Edmund the fifth sonne.

Three yeare old at his Fathers death.

(25) Edred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Edgiua his third Wife, and the youngest sonne of them both, was borne about the two and twentieth yeere of his Fathers Raigne, and yeere of grace 923. which was not long before the death of his Father, who left him a little infant in the custodie of his Mother, by whom he was carefully brought vp, and prooued a Prince of so great vertue and valour, as after the death of King Edmund his brother in regard of the minoritie of his Nephews, Edburg the eight daughter. Ran. Higden. Polyc. lib. 6. cap. 4.

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgina, in her childhood had her disposition tryed, and her course of life disposed by her Father in this manner: he laid before her gorgeous apparrell, and rich Iewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Testament and Bookes of princely instruction in the other; willing her to make her choice of which she liked best: she presently tooke vp the bookes, and he her in his armes; kissing her said, Goe in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monastery at Winchester, wherein shee did most vertuously spend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

Edgina the ninth daughter.

(27) Edgina, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the second of his last Queene, whose name shee bare, is reported in the History of the Monastery of Hyde by Winchester, and other Writers of our Country, to haue beene married to Lewes Prince of Aquitaine in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it selfe, sometime allotted to the portion of Lewes the third sonne of the Emperour Charles the Great; of which house it seemeth this Lewes was; afterward it became a Dukedome, & the possession of another Family, by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conquest to the Kings of England, which were descended of the house of Angeow.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward (as hath beene said) for the great hopes conceiued of him, was crowned with greater solemnitie then any of his ancestors euer before him. The place was Crowned at Kingston vpon Thamisis.

Kingston vpon Thamisis in the County of Surrey, the yeere of Christ Iesus 924. where, in the midst of the Towne a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the coronation performed to the open view of all, by Athelmus, Archbishop of Canterbury, with shouts of ioy as that of Salomon.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reason of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a Nobleman, either in fauour of King Edwards other sons, holding Ethelstan

Will. Malmesb.

ſtan a Baſtard, or elſe vpon an ambitious hope for himſelfe, intended at Winchester to haue pluckt out the eyes of his Soueraigne: but his treaſon being knowne, before the ſeed could ſhew blade, he was apprehended and ſent to Rome to purge himſelfe by oth: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope Iohn the tenth, hee there abiured the act, and thereupon fell ſodainly downe to the earth, ſo that his ſeruants tooke and bare him into the Engliſh Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him chriſtian buriall vntill he knew King Ethelſtans pleaſure.

Pope Iohn the tenth.

(3) Theſe ſtormes ouerpaſt, as great a cloud ſeeing to ariſe vnto Ethelſtans ſight, whoſe eye of iealouſie euer following the aſcent, and his eare euer opened vnto the inſtillations of Paraſites, amongſt whom his cup-bearer was a chiefe; who brought daily more and more ſuſpition into the Kings head, that laſtly (as wee haue ſhewed) he conſented to young Edwins death, though with too late a ſorrow he repented the ſame: for beſides his ſeauen yeares penance for his betrayed brother, he built the two Monaſteries of Midleton and Michelneſſe, as for the moſt part ſuch ſeed-plots were euer ſowne in the furrowes of bloud, which hapned vpon this occaſion: It chanced his Cup-bearer in his ſeruice vpon a feſtiuall to ſtumble with the one foote, & recouering himſelf with the other, pleaſantly to ſay, you ſee how one brother helpeth another; vpon which ſpeech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to minde the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with deſerued death: and himſelfe was euer after more tender and carefull towards his other brethren, with a more reſpectiue regard, and beſtowed his ſiſters moſt honourably in mariage, as hath bin ſaid.

(4) At his entrance of gouernment, to diſcharge the expectations of his ſubiects, he endeuoured both by warres and alliances to make them ſtrong and rich. Firſt therefore entring friendſhip with Sithricke the Daniſh King of Northumberland, vpon whom with condition that he ſhould receiue Baptiſme, he beſtowed his ſiſter Editha in marriage, he bent himſelfe to ordaine Lawes for the weale-publike, and thoſe to bind aſwell the Clergie as the Laiety, out of which firſt ſprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of ſuch as ſtole aboue twelue pence, & were aboue twelue yeares of age.

(5) But Sithricke the Northumbrian dying the firſt yeare of his marriage, and his Queene returning to a religious life, his ſonnes Godfrey and Anlafe, offended that their Pagan Gods were neglected, and onely by the meanes of this their Fathers laſt wife, ſtirred the Northumbrians to diſquiet the Engliſh, which occaſioned Ethelſtan to inuade their Country: and forced Anlafe into Ireland, and Godfrey into Scotland; which laſt ſo wrought with Conſtantine their King, that he vndertooke to ſide in his quarrell, with whom ioyned* Howel King of Wales. Theſe in a fierce battaile he ouercame & conſtrained them to ſubmit themſelues to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to be variable, and pittying the caſe of theſe downcaſt Princes, reſtored them preſently to their former eſtates, adding withall this princely ſaying, That it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithſtanding, the caſe of Godfrey ſo moued the ſpirit of King Conſtantine, that he againe aſſiſted him in his inrodes into the Engliſh part, which drew againe King Ethelſtan into the North: and comming to York-ſhire (as he was a man much deuoted to God-ward) turned aſide to viſit the tombe of S. Iohn of Beuerly, where earneſtly praying for his proſperous ſucceſſe, for want of richer Iewels, there offered his knife, vowing that if he returned with Conqueſt, he would redeeme it with a worthy price; and thus armed with hope, proceeded forward, pitching downe his tents at Brimesbury, his Nauie waffing along thoſe Seas.

(7) To the ayd of Conſtantine came Anlafe, called by Writers King of the Iriſh, & of the Iles, who had maried his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and deſperate, as appeared by the action he vnderwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the Engliſh had attempted to know the ſtate of the Danes; ſo this Dane at this place did to vnderſtand the Engliſh: for diſguiſing himſelfe like a Harper, he went from Tent to Tent, and had acceſſe euen into King Ethelſtanes preſence, vntill hee had learned what he moſt deſired, and then returned againe to his campe: which part of his was no bolder nor more wiſely performed, then was kept ſecret, and after reuealed by a moſt faithfull Souldier: for Anlafe departed and free from purſuit, this Souldier made the act known to King Ethelſtan, who being ſore diſplea-displeased with his enemies escape, imputed the fault vnto him the reuealer; but he replying, made him this answere; I once serued Anlafe (said he) vnder his pay for a Souldier, and gaue him the same faith that I doe now vnto you, if then I should haue betrayed his designes, what trust could your Grace repose in my truth? let him therefore die, but not through my treachery, and by his escape secure your royall selfe from danger; remoone your Tent from the place where it stands, lest at vnawares he haply assaile you.

Anlafe his Souldiers fidelitie.

(8) The King seeing the faith of his Souldier, was therewith pacified, and forthwith commanded his Tent to be remooued, where presently a Bishoppe new come to his Campe pitched vp his owne, and the night following both himselfe and retinue were slaine by the same Anlafe that sought the Kings life in assaulting the place; and pressing forward came to his Tent, who awaked with the suddaine Allarum, boldly rushed vpon his enemies, and encouraging his men, put them back with the death of fiue petty Kings, twelue Dukes, and well neere of the whole Army, which Anlafe had brought.

(9) The memory of this man is made the more lasting by a peece of ancient Saxon coine of siluer, inscribed with his name, ANLAF CYNYNE, which for the antiquity of the thing, and honor of the man we haue here imprinted, and placed, though in the texture of our English Saxon Kings.

(10) To leaue a memoriall of King Ethelstans great victory, giue me leaue to write what I find; namely, that neere vnto the Castle Dunbar in Scotland, he praying that his right vnto those parts might be confirmed vnto posterities by a signe, at one blow with his sword strucke an elle deepe into a stone, which stood so clouen a long time after, and vndoubtedly was the whetstone to this Authors knife, with the like credit as Tarquinius his whetstone was cut asunder by Actius Neuius the Augur his Razour: but this is most certaine, that he ioyned Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and returning to Beuerly redeemed his owne knife.

(11) From hence he turned his warres into Wales, whose Rulers and Princes he brought to be his Tributaries, who at Hereford entred Couenant to pay him yearely twentie pound weight of gold, three hundred of siluer, and twentie fiue hundred head of Cattle, with hawkes and hounds to a certaine number, towards which payment by the statutes of Howell Dha, the King of Aberfraw was charged at sixty six pounds; the Prince Dineuwre, and the Prince of Powys were to pay the like summes.

(12) The Britaines, which to this time with all equall right inhabited the Citie of Excester with the Saxons, he expelled into the further promontory of Cornwall, and made Tamar the confines of his own Empire; so that his Dominion was the largest that any Saxon before him had enioyed, and his fame the greatest with al forrain Princes, who sought his friendship both with loue and alliance, by matching with his sisters, and presenting him with rich and rare presents; For Hugh King of France, besides other venestimable Iewels, sent him the sword of Constantine the Great, in the hilt whereof (all couered with gold) was one of the nailes that fastned Christ to his Crosse; he sent likewise the speare of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same that pierced Christ his side, as also part of the Crosse whereon he suffered his passion, and a peece of the thorny Crowne wherewith his blessed Temples were begoared; and with these came the Banner of Saint Maurice so often spread by Charles the Great, in his Christian Warres against the Saracens; And from Otho the Emperour, who had married his sister, was sent a vessell of precious stones artificially made, wherein were seene Lanskips with Vines, Corne and Men, all of them seeming so naturally to moue, as if they had growne and retained life: And the King of Norway sent him a goodly Ship with a guilt sterne, purple sailes, and the decke garnished all with gold.

For among theſe ancient Saxon-Coynes, wee finde one of Ceolnothus, who ſate there Arch-biſhop in the yeare 831. which both for the antiquitie and authoritie of truth we haue here inſerted.

As Tindale reporteth in his Preface to the obedience of, &c. But the chiefeſt of his workes, for the knowledge of God, and good of his ſubiects, was, the tranſlation of the Bible into the Saxon tongue, the mother ſpeech then of the Engliſh, which he cauſed to be done.

Ethelſtans vertues. (15) This Prince King Ethelſtan was of an indifferent ſtature, not much exceeding the common ſort of men, chearefull in countenance, his haire very yellow, and ſomewhat ſtooped forward as hee went; for valour inuincible, in reſolution conſtant, and for his curteſie beloued of all: he raigned in great honour the ſpace of fifteene yeares and odde monethes, and deceaſed in the Citie of Glouceſter, vpon Wedneſday the ſeuenteenth of October, and was buried at Malmesbury the yeare of Chriſts Natiuitie 940. hauing neuer had wife mentioned in our Hiſtories.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

An. D. 940.

EDmund the fifth ſon of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiua his third and laſt wife, at the age of nineteene yeeres ſucceeded his brother King Ethelſtan in his Kingdome, and Monarchy: he began his raigne the yeere of the worlds ſaluation 940. and with great ſolemnity was crowned at Kingſton vpon Thamiſis, in the fifth yeer of Otho the firſt Emperour of that name, and his brother in law; his valour had often beene tryed in the wars of king Ethelſtan againſt thoſe ſtout and ſturdy enemies the Danes, Scottiſh, Iriſh, and Welſhmen, that often had aſſailed to diſturbe his peace.

Will. Malmesb.

(2) Athelſtan deceaſed, and the crown ſcarce ſet vpon King Edmunds head, but that the Danes in Northumberland, diſliking ſubiection, called againe Anlafe out of Ireland to be their King; who now in the infancy of Edmunds eſtate, with great power of men purpoſed to ſubdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full reſolution meant to keepe what was got; and ſo gathering his power, proceeded towards the North, and at Leiceſter encountred with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbiſhops of Canterburie and Yorke, Odo and wolſtan, the matter was mitigated before it came to the vttermoſt.

An. D. 942.

(3) The next yeere of his raigne, the ſayd Anlafe (whom ſome hold to haue beene the King of Norway) beeing dead, an other Analfe, ſonne to King Sitbrick, of whom wee haue ſpoken, intruded vpon the kingdome of Northumberland. Theſe heads, as Hidraes, ſpringing vp each after others, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a prouoked Lion, ſubdued, as hee went, thoſe townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leiceſter, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receiue Baptiſme, and to become his Subiects; ſo that the Country was wholy his vnto Humber. Theſe his proceedings cauſed Anlafe & Reinold the ſonnes of the Daniſh Gurmo, ſubduers of Yorke, to yeeld themſelues wholy to his deuotion, offering him ſubiection, and withal to receiue the Christian faith; for performance whereof, they likewise receiued Baptisme, vnto whom King Edmund was God-father, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anlafe at the Font: but how soone they fell from both, the sequell shewed; for casting off the faith and fealty thus promised, they stirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better successe then desert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioyned that Country to his owne gouernment, without the admittance of any Secondary or Viceroy to rule there vnder him.

An. D. 944. Simeon Dunelm.

(4) Cumberland also, which seldome was quiet, hauing beene a Kingdome entire of it selfe, and now ayded by Leolin King of Southwales, he vtterly wasted, and apprehending the two sonnes of Dunmaile King of that Prouince, commanded the eyes of those ouer-bold Princes to be puld out, and gaue their inheritance to Malcolm king of Scots, to hold the same by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing those coasts whence the sharpest stormes had continually blown, hee returned into the South, and there set himselfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, lest time the consumer of all things might chance to obliterate, were by the labours of the learned Lambert translated into Latine, & imprinted in the yeer 1568. next, to shew his loue to God, and bounty to his Church, hee gaue the towne of Saint Edmundsbury with the liberties thereof, wholy to that Martyr, and to the Monks that liued in seruing at his Altars.

(5) But as each thing hath his spring, growth, and decay; so all men their dates, howsoeuer eminent in degree, and the shank of their compasse so set in a center that the Circle of their liues are oftentimes abrupt. before it be drawne to the full round. For so with others we may see in this Monarch, who being safely returned from many great dangers of war, at peace in his Palace, came to a lamentable & vnexpected end: for at his Manor of Pucle-kerkes in the County of Glouceſter, whiles hee interposed himselfe betweene his Sewer and one Leone to part a fray, was, with a thrust through the body, wounded to death the twenty sixth of May, in the yeer of our saluation 946. when he had prosperously raigned the space of fiue yeres & seuen moneths, and his body, with no lesse sorrow then solemnity, was buried at Glastenbury.

His Wife.

(6) Elfgine, the only wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I finde) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that she was married vnto him in the first yeere of his raigne, which was the yeere of grace, 940. and that she was his wife foure yeeres & vpward, after whose slaughter she remained a mournfull widdow all the rest of her life, which she spent with so great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the writers of that age shee is commended to posterity by the name of a Saint.

Elfgine.

His Issue.

(7) Edwy, the eldest sonne of King Edmund, and Queene Elfgine his Wife, was borne in the second yeere of his Fathers raigne Anno 942. When his Father dyed, hee was but foure yeeres of age, and in respect of his minority was not permitted to succeed him in the Kingdome, but forced to giue place to his vncle Edred, vnder whom he liued nine yeeres: and in the tenth, his vncle being dead, and himselfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the succession of the Monarchy.

Edwy.

(8) Edgar the second sonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, the yeere of Christ Iesus 943, and was but three yeeres old when his Father dyed; notwithstanding, hee proued afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the second yeer of King Edwy his brothers raigne, being then but fourteene yeeres of age, hee was chosen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people hee gouerned vnder the title of King of Mercia, for the space of two yeres before his brothers death, and then succeeded him in the whole Monarchie.

CHAPTER XL.

An. Do. 946

EDred, the ſixth ſonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiua his third and laſt wife, at the age of 23. yeeres ſucceeded his brother King Edmund in the nonage of his children in all his dominions, and was the twenty ſeuenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty eight Monarch of the Engliſhmen. Hee began his raigne in the yeere of Mans ſaluation 946. & was annointed, and crowned at Kingſtone vpon Thames in the County of Surrey vpon Sunday the ſeuenteenth day of Auguſt, by the hands of Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Polyd. lib. 6. cap. 8.

(2) His Coronation robes ſcarſly put off, newes was brought him that the Northumbrians had reuolted & ſtirred a dangerous inſurrection, notwithſtanding the Couenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots, to ſecure the ſame. Therefore leſt delaies might proue dangerous, with a great Armie hee entred into the verge of Scotland, without ſight of enemy, or any reſiſtance. But peace being concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme, and the Northumbrians; yea and the ſame confirmed ſtrongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the laſt named Iurers; for no ſooner was Edred returned, but that they ſent into Ireland for Anlafe, the ſonne of Gurmo the Dane, who had beene expelled the Country, as wee haue ſaid.

Edred. Malcolme.

(3) Anlafe gathering a fleete and forces accordingly, came into Northumberland, where he was with great ioy receiued and made their King; which title he maintained for foure yeres continuance, banding againſt Edred, and ſtill holding him play, til laſtly the Northumbrians diſloiall to both, tooke their feather out of Anlafe his plume, and ſent him packing to the place, whence hee came, electing one Hericus King in his ſtead.

(4) Edred awaked with the waſts that they made, prepared a iourney into thoſe parts, where with fire and ſword he bare downe all before him; and albeit he was a man religiouſly bent, yet ſpared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all vnto aſhes as hee went, the enemy not daring to ſhew the face. their array, whereby many perished before any complete order of resistance could be made. The King seing this bold attempt of these Rebels, stroke down his standard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatened the reuenge, with the Countries spoyle and their liues, Wolstan. (5) In this plot of sedition Wolstan Archbishop of Yorke had sown some seed of treason, both in the assistance of action, and counsell for the enterprise, very ill beseeming a man of his ranke: this Wolfe therefore hauing thus awaked the Lion from rest, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northumbrians expulsing their stateless Hericus, with submissiue teares and golden showers, so pacified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane washed away: but hee good man (a Saint at the least) was mued vp in prison (against whom accusations daily came, & namely, that hee had commanded sundrie of the Burgesses of Thetford to be slaine) where hee abode till hee was by Edred vpon a reuerent regard of his calling, released from thence: for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous, so is hee no lesse for his iustice towards the vicious: and for the practise of his Religion, as forward as any, suffering not onely his manners to be reproued and corrected, (a quality truely royall, and best seeming Princes) but also (so much below the pitch of soueraigne Maiesty) his body to be chastised at the will and direction of Dunstan Abbot of Glastenbury; vnto whose custody, hee also committed the greatest part of his treasure and richest iewels to bee lockt in his chests, and under the keyes of this Monastery.

Will. Malms.

Asser. (6) The stately Abbey of Mich at Abington neere Oxford, built by King Inas, but destroyed by the Danes, hee newly repaired, indowing it with lands & faire reuenewes, and confirmed the Charters with seales of gold: hee also ordained Saint Germans in Cornwal to be a Bishops See, which there continued till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopall See of Kyrton in Deuon; both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor translated into the City of Excester: but sith the brightest day hath his night, and the highest tide his present ebbe, what maruell is it, if then Edred in the middest of his strength were seazed vpon by sickenesse and death? which surprised him after he had raigned in great honour nine yeeres and odde moneths, to the great griefe of his Subiects, who solemnly interred him in the old Minster within the City of Winchester, the yeere of Christ Iesus 955. whose bones with other Kings, to this day are preserued in a guilt Coffer fixed vpon the wall in the south side of the Quier.

His Issue.

Elfred. (7) Elfred, the sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mother, or any act by him done; onely in the sixt yeere of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeere of grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witnesse to his Fathers graunt of lands in Wittenham, to Ethelwolfe a Duke of England in those dayes, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeere aforesayd.

Bertfrid. (8) Bertfrid an other, and as it seemeth, an elder sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King, without any mention also of his Mother, who liuing in the second yeere of his fathers raigne, namely Anno. 948. was written for a witnesse in the same yeere, to his grant of lands in Bedlaking, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to bee seene vnto this day.

EDwy, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, after the deceaſe of his Vncle Edred, ſucceeded him in his dominions, and was the twenty eighth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty ninth Monarch of the Engliſhmen: hee began his raigne in the yeere of the worlds ſaluation, 955. and was annointed and crowned at Kingſtone vpon Thameſis, by the hands of Otho the 22. (2) Yong hee was in yeeres, and vicious of life, if the Monkiſh Story writers of thoſe times (his deadly enemies) may bee credited not paſt thirteene, when he entred gouernment, and that begun with a capitall ſinne: for they report, that vpon the ſolemne day of his Coronation, and in ſight of his Nobles, as they ſate in Counſell, with ſhameleſſe and vnprincelike luſt, hee abuſed a Lady of great eſtate, and his neere kinſwoman, whoſe husband ſhortly after he ſlew, the more freely to poſſeſſe his inceſtuous pleaſure: and to fill the pennes of his further infamy ready to their hands, that wrote his life, he was a great enemy vnto the Monkiſh orders (a ſore in thoſe dayes very tender to be touched, and may well bee thought the cauſe of many falſe aſperſions on him) whom from the Monaſtery of Malmesbury, Glaſtenbury, and others, hee expelled, placing married Prieſts in their roomes: Dunſtan likewiſe the Abbot-Saint of Glaſtenburie he baniſhed the Realme, for his ouer-bold reprehenſions; if not rather for retaining the treaſure deliuered him by King Edred, & demanded againe in his ſickneſſe; when by the voice (forſooth) of an Angel from heauen, his journey was ſtayed, and thoſe rich Iewels not deliuered the King in his life; I will not ſay kept backe, leſt Dunſtan with Balaam (whoſe ſtories are not much vnlike) ſhould be thought to follow (as he did) the wages of deceit.

full, d rew backe the current of their ſubiectiue affections, and ſet the eye of obedience vpon Prince Edgar his Brother: and albeit his young yeeres may ſeeme to cleare him from the imputation of ſo luſtfull a fact, as he is charged with at the day of his aſſuming the Crowne, and the ſeparation from his wife (as too neere in conſanguinity) wrought griefe enough in his diſtreſſed heart, yet pittileſſe of his eſtate and careleſſe of their owne allegiance, the Mercians with the Northumbrians did vtterly caſt off obedience, and ſweare their fealty to Edgar, not fully foureteene yeeres aged: Edwy then raigning in a ſtill decaying eſtate, was held of ſuch his ſubiects, in no better eſteeme, then was Iehoram of Iudah, who is ſayd to haue liued without being deſired: for very griefe whereof, after foure yeeres raigne he ended his life, the yeare of our Lord, 959. whoſe body was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hide at Wincheſter, erected without the Wall in the North of that City.

His Wife.

(4) Elfgiue, the wife of King Edwy, was a Lady of great beauty, and nobly deſcended, yea, and by ſome deemed ſomewhat too neere in the blond royall, to be matched with him in ſpouſall bed: her fathers name is not recorded, but her mother was Ethelgiue, whom ſome ſcandalized to haue beene his Concubine, and the onely cauſer of Dunſtanes baniſhment. The ſubiects diſliking of this vnlawfull marriage, and further inſtigated by the Monks, (whoſe humorous pleaſures, or diſpleaſures could very much ſway the State in thoſe dayes,) failed by degrees to performe their duties to their King, and her they likewiſe enforced to a ſeparation, in the third yeare of his regardleſſe gouernment, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 958. without other mention of her life or death.

EDGAR SVRNAMED THE PEACEABLE, THE THIRTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES AND ISSVE.

Monart. 30.

CHAPTER XLII.

An. Do. 959

EDgar, the ſecond ſonne of king Edmund, hauing raigned two yeeres ouer the Mercians and Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his brother, to the great impairing of king Edwyes reputation and eſteeme; after his death at ſixteen yeares of age was choſen to ſucceed in all his dominions, and was the thirtieth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, or rather now of whole England, all other titles of kingdome falling vnder his his ſcepter, and becomming Prouinces annexed vnto his abſolute Monarchy.

(2) He beganne his raigne in the yeer of Chriſts Natiuity, 959. and was crowned (as ſome write) the ſame yeare at Kingſton vpon Thameſis, by Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Randulphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yere of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirtieth yere of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of Worceſter Church, to the yeere of Chriſt, 972. and that in the City of Bath, hee was annointed and conſecrated with great ſolemnity by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Polydor. Virg. Rand. Higden. Will. Malm. Saxon Chron.

(3) The raigne of this King is ſayd to haue beene altogether in a calme tranquillity, and therefore he was ſurnamed the Peaceable; his vertues were many, and vices not a few, the one gloriouſly augmented, and the other fairely excuſed, by thoſe Monkiſh writers, vnto whoſe profeſſions he was moſt fauourable: his Guides were Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ethelwold Abbot of Glaſtenbury, & Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, three ſtout Champions againſt the maried Clergy, (for women in thoſe dayes were great bugs in their eyes,) therefore the maried Prieſts he diſplaced, and brought in Monkes of ſingle life to poſſeſſe their roomes, whoſe ſinnes of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witnes, which cauſed Treuiſa the tranſlator of Higden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to be lewdly moued in following their counſell againſt maried Clerkes.

Edgar the Peaceable.

Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 9.

(4) So doe Malmsbury and Higden taxe him with too fauourable affections towardes the Danes, who dwelled alike in euery towne with the Engliſh, though formerly they had ſought the deſtruction of all, and ſtill lay in waite attending for the ſpoile of his true ſubiects, who apt enough vnto euill, learned the beaſtly ſinne of quaffing, and emptying their cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redreſſe, by enacting a law againſt exceſſiue drinking, ordaining a ſize by certaine pinnes ſet in the pot, with penalties to any that ſhould preſume to drinke deeper then the marke.

Will. Malmesb.

(5) His Policy was no leſſe prudent (but much more ſucceſſefull) forthe deſtruction of Wolues, that in his dayes did great annoiance to the land: for the tribute impoſed on the Princes of Wales by the Engliſh King Ethelſtan (as wee haue ſaid) he wholy remitted, and in lieu thereof, appointed certaine numbers of Wolues yeerely to be paid; and Ienaf, or Iage, Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yeerely three hundred; which continued for three yeeres ſpace, but in the fourth was not a Wolfe to be found, and ſo the tribute ceaſed.

Cap. 38. Sect. 8.

Cron. Wald.

(6) His Nauy royall, containing three thouſand and ſix hundred ſhips, hee diuided into three parts, appointing euery of them to a ſeuerall quarter to waffe the Seas, and ſecure the coaſts from Pirats, and forraine enemies; wherein himſelfe euery ſummer would ſaile with thoſe in the Eaſt parts, vnto thoſe in the Weſt, and ſending them backe to their charge, would with the Weſt ſaile into the North, and with the northerne fleete compaſſe againe into the Eaſt, whereby the ſeas were ſcowred, and his kingdome exceedingly ſtrengthned.

Mar. Scot. Alred. Rieual. Ran. Higden.

(7) The like cuſtome vſed hee in the winter ſeaſon in his ieyſts, and circuits throughout his Country, ſo to take account of the adminiſtration of his lawes, and the demeanour of his great men, eſpecially of his Iudges, whom ſeuerely he puniſhed, ſo often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; ſo that there was neuer leſſe robbery, deceit or oppreſſions, then in the raigne of this worthy King.

Edgars honeſt vigilancy.

(8) His ſtate thus flouriſhing in peace and proſperity, he cauſed diuers Princes to bind themſelues vnto his allegiance, but perchance it may iuſtly be doubted, whether in ſuch performance of homage and ſervice, as Malmsbury, Florentius, Randulphus, Marianus, Honeden, and other writers affirme to haue been at the City Cheſter, where (they ſay) Kennadie King of Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Maxentius an Arch-Pirate, with the petty Kings of Wales, Duffnal, Griffith, Huual, Iacob, and Iudithil, did with ores row his Barge vpon the riuer Dee, from his Palace to Saint Iohns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himſelfe the while ſteering the helme, and ſaying in his glory, that then his ſucceſſours might truely account themſelues Souteraigne Kings of England, when they enioyed ſuch a prerogatiue of ſublimity, and ſupreme honour: although (ſaith M. Fox.) he might much better, and more Chriſtian like haue ſaid, God forbid that I ſhould reioyce, but in the Croſſe of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Edgars league with diuers Kings.

Gal. 6. 14.

(9) Warres hee had none in all his raigne, raigne; only towards the end, the Welshmen moued some rebellion, which to preuent, he assembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the Country, of Glamorgan, sharply punishing the ring-leaders thereof; but his souldiers doing great harmes in the country, laden with spoyles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to bee againe restored, whereby he purchased singular loue and honour of the Inhabitants.

Polychron.

Monastery built by King Edgar.

(10) To his magnanimity was ioyned much deuotion, but most especially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes he built and repaired forty seuen Monasteries, intending to haue continued their number vnto fifty; as himselfe testifieth in these words of his Charter.

Ex chart. Reg.

The Monasteries, aswell of Monks as of Virgins, haue beene destroyed, and quite neglected throughout England, which I haue now determined to repaire to the glory of God for my soules health, and so to multiply the number of Gods seruants and handmaides: and now already I haue set vp forty seuen Monasteries with Monkes and Nunnes in them, and if Christ spare me life so long, I am determined in offering my deuout munificence to God to proceed to fifty, euen to the iust number of a Iubilee.

M. Fox in his Acts and Monuments.

And by this his Charter did not onely approue the enlargement of S. Maries Monastery in Worcester, and the restoring of Votaries in stead of married Priests, but himselfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the house of Ely, Glastenbury, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramsey, Wilton, Wenton, Winchorne and Thumstocke, with great cost, and large endowments, hauing the Clergy in an high and reuerent esteeme, and most of all his Confessor Dunstan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkish Writers binde them vp for good corne: for some men tell (sayth Randulphus Higden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruell to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof these his actions ensuing beare sufficient witnesse.

Ran. Higden.

will. Malmesb. Mathew Paris. Math. Westmin.

(11) The first was committed against the Virgine Wolfhild, a sacred Nunne as some affirme, though others somewhat mittigating that sacrilegious offence, haue reported, that shee to auoyde his fleshly and lasciuious lust, was forced to take the habite of a Menchion vpon her, and in the same brought to his bed, wherein the chast S. Edith was begot, and for whom, say they, he vnderwent his seuen yeeres penance, without the wearing of his Crowne.

Polydor. lib. 6. cap. 9.

(12) A like offence he committed against the virgine Ethelfleda, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the East-Angles, who for her surpassing beauty was surnamed the White; on whom hee begat his eldest sonne Edward; for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, he did his seuen yeeres penance inioyned by Dunstan: and indeed by Osberne it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the harlot, he baptized in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and so giuing his name to bee called Edward, did adopt him to be his sonne. With whom agree Nicolas Trinet in his English story, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French story, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a sonne illegitimate; as also doth Vincentius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Malmesbury, Mathew Paris, Mathew of Westminster, Randulphus and others, will haue her his first and lawfull wife, and Edward in true Matrimonie to haue descended from them.

(13) An other instance of his lasciuious life is produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occasioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare of a Virgine & daughter to a Westerne Duke, exceedingly praysed for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which string from his eare resounded to his heart, and as a bait it drew him presently into those parts; where comming to Andeuer, commanded the damsel to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maide, but not her daughter, who, as well pleased the King in his sinnefull dalliance; the day approching, this late laid maid made haste to arise: but the King loth to part yet with his supposed faire Lady, demanded why shee made such haste? Who answered him, that her taske was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day should preuent her ere shee rose: but yet being stayed aboue her howre, vpon her knees shee made this humble request, that she might be freed from her shrewd dame, alleadging it was not fitting, that the woman who had tasted the pleasures of a Kings embracements, should endure a seruitude vnder the rule of any other. The King perceiuing the deceit, and therewith moued to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather vndone) and therefore turned his conceiued wrongs vnto a iest: but so, that hee both sharpely checked the deceiuer,

& kept this damſell, (whoſe night worke and pleaſance had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby ſhe ruled them that lately had the command of her: and to vſe the words of Malmsbury, he loued his Concubine moſt entirely: keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time he married for his lawfull wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

Malmſ. de regi.

(14) His laſt laſciuious Act, was as Dauids ioyned with blood, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames lauiſh report of beauteous Elfrida (the paragon of her ſexe, and wonder of nature) the onely daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Deuonſhire, ſounded ſo loud in thoſe Weſterne parts, that the Eccho thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and entred his eares, which euer lay open, to giue his eyes the ſcope of deſire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of will: to trie the truth whereof, hee ſecretly ſent his minion or fauourite Earle Ethelwold of Eaſt-Anglia, who well could iudge of beauty, and knew the dyet of the King; with Commiſſion, that if the Pearle proued ſo orient, it ſhould be ſeized for Edgars owne wearing, who meant to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the father of a King.

Duke Ordgarus.

Ethelwold.

Ethelwold a iolly young Gallant, poſted into Deuonſhire, and gueſt-wiſe viſited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where ſeeing the Lady ſurpaſſing the report, blamed Fames ouer-ſight for ſounding her praiſe in ſo baſe and leaden a Trumpet, and wholly ſurpriſed with her loue, himſelfe beganne to wooe the Virgin, yea, and with her fathers good liking, ſo as the King would giue his aſſent. Earle Ethelwold returning, related that the maide indeed was faire; but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts any wiſe befitting a King. Edgar miſtruſting no corriuall in his loue, nor dreaming falſe fellowſhip in wooing, did with a ſleight thought paſſe ouer Elfrida, and pitcht his affections the faſter another way. Earle Ethelwold following the game now a foot, deſired Edgars aſſiſtance to bring it to a ſtand, pretending not ſo much for any liking to the Lady, as to raiſe his owne fortunes to bee her fathers heire; to which the King yeelded, and for his minion ſollicited Ordgarus, who glad to be ſhrowded vnder the fauours of ſuch a fauorite, willingly conſented; and his daughters deſtinies aſſured to Earle Ethelwold.

Edgar a ſuter for Ethelwold.

The mariage ſolemnized, and the fruits thereof a ſhort time enioyed; the fame of her beauty beganne againe to be ſpread; and that with a larger Epithet then formerly it had beene: Whereupon Edgar much doubting of double dealing, laid his angle faire to take this great gull: and bearing no ſhew of wrong or ſuſpect, inuited himſelfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into thoſe parts, did not a little grace his old ſeruant, to the great ioy of Ordgarus the Duke. But Ethelwold miſtruſting the cauſe of his comming, thought by one policy to diſappoint another: and therefore reuealing the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings hee had wronged her beauty, and deceiued his Soueraign, requeſted her louing aſſiſtance to ſaue now his endangered life, which lay in her power; and of the meanes hee thus aduiſed:

Lady Elfrida thus left to her ſelfe, be- gan ſeriouſly to thinke vpon this curtain Sermon, whoſe text ſhee diſtated, being taken out of an ouer-worne and threed- bare cloth prouerbe, as though her for- tunes had beene wholly reſiding, and al- together conſiſting in her parentage and apparrell, but nothing at all in any parts of her ſelfe.

And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, ſhee attended the ap- proach and entrance of the King, whom with ſuch faire obeiſance, & ſeemly grace ſhe receiued, that Edgars greedy eye pre- ſently collecting the raies of her ſhining beauty, became a burning glaſſe to his heart; and the ſparkle of her faire, falling into the traine of his loue, ſet al his ſenſes on fire: yet diſſembling his paſſions, hee paſſed on to his game, where hauing the falſe Ethelwold at aduantage, hee ranne him through with a Iaueline, and tooke faire Elfrida to his wife. Elfrida diſloi- alty. Ethelwold ſlain

(15) Theſe were the vertues and vices of this King, little in perſonage, but great in ſpirit, and the firſt vnreſiſted Monarch of the whole Land, whom all the other Saxons acknowledged their ſupreme, without diuiſion of Prouinces or title. Hee raigned ſixteen yeeres and two moneths in great tranquility & honour, and died vpon tueſday the eighth of Iuly the thirty ſeuenth of his age, and yeere of Chriſt 975. whoſe body with all funerall ſolemnity was buried in the abbey of Glaſtenbury. His Wiues.

(16) Ethelfled, the first wife of King Edgar, was surnamed in the Saxon Englisſh Eneba, in Latine Candida, which with vs is White, becauſe of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongſt the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married vnto him the ſecond yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 961. Shee was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in anno 962.

Ethelfleds parents.

Elfrida ſecond wife.

(17) Elfrida, the ſecond wife of King Edgar, was the widow of ſlaughtered Ethelwold, of whom we haue ſayd. Shee was daughter to Ordgarus, and ſiſter to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Deuonſhire, and the Founders of Taueſtoke abbey in that Country: a Lady of paſſing great beauty, and as ambitious as faire: for after the Kings death, ſhee procured the murther of King Edward her ſon in law, that her own ſon Ethelred might come to the crowne: and afterwards to pacifie his and her firſt husbands ghoſt, and to ſtop the peoples ſpeeches of ſo wicked a fact, ſhe founded the Abbeys of Ambresbery & Whorwell, in the Counties of Wiltſhire and Southampton.

Will Malmesb.

His Children.

Edward the eldeſt ſonne.

(18) Edward, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edgar and Queen Ethelfled his firſt wife, was borne in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 662. He was a child diſpoſed to al vertue notwithſtanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the diſinheriting of him, and the preferment of her own ſon to the ſucceſſion of the Crown; yet by prouident care taken in the life time of his father, he ſucceded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

Edmund the ſecond ſonne.

(19) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne of King Edgar, and the firſt of Queen Elfrida his ſecond wife, was borne in the ſeuenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965, Hee liued but foure yeeres, and dyed in his infancy, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably enterred in the Monaſterie of Nunnes, at Ramſey in Hampſhire, which King Edgar had founded.

Ethelred the third ſonne.

(20) Ethelred, the third ſon of King Edgar, and the ſecond of Queene Elfrida his ſecond wife, & the laſt of them both, was borne in the eighth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of ſaluation 966. He was vertuouſly inclined, beautifull in complexion, and comly of ſtature; at the death of his father being but ſeuen yeers old, and at his brothers murther ten: which deed hee ſore lamented, to the great diſcontentment of his mother, who for his aduancement had complotted the ſame, and wherein at thoſe yeeres he vnwillingly ſucceeded him.

Edgith.

(21) Edgith, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Wolfhild, the daughter of Wolfhelm the ſonne of Byrding, the ſon of Neſting, the two latter bearing in their names the memory of their fortunes: the laſt of them being found in an Eagles neſt, by King Elfred as he was on hunting. This Edgith was a vailed Nunne in the Monaſtery of Wilton, and according to ſome Authors, made Abbeſſe thereof by her father at fifteene yeeres of age, ſayth her Legend. Shee dyed the fifteenth day of September, the yeere of her age twenty three; the ſixth of her brother King Ethelreds raigne, & of Chriſt Ieſus 984. By all which accounts it is manifeſt, that ſhee was borne before Edward, and by maſter Fox proued, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his ſeuen yeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chaſtity and beauty, which latter ſhe ſomewhat augmented with more curious attire then to her profeſſion was beſeeming, for which Biſhoppe Ethelwold ſharpely reproued her; who anſwered him roundly, that God regarded the heart more then the garment, and that ſins might be couered as well vnder rags as robes.

This Edgith, as Iohn Capgraue reporteth, after the ſlaughter of her brother Edward, the holy archbiſhop Dunſtan would haue aduanced to the Crowne, and inueſted her againſt Ethelred the lawful heire, had ſhe not by the late experience of Edwards fall, vtterly refuſed that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was ſafe for her perſon to vndertake. Her body was buried at wilton, in the Monaſtery and Church of Saint Deniſſe, which her ſelfe had cauſed to bee built.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Simon Dunelm. Roger Houen.

GReat were the troubles and ſidings that preſently enſued the death of King Edgar, about the Election of one of his ſonnes to ſucceede; Queene Elfrida with Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, diſauowing Prince Edward as illegitimate, and therefore not reputable for ſucceſſion: Againſt them and Ethelred ſtood Dunſtan & the Monks, holding their ſtates dangerous, and their new-gotten footing vnſure, if in the nonage of the King, theſe their oppoſites ſhould rule all vnder him; whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould; whoſe title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptiall bed of Queene Ethelfleda. Their claimes thus banded amongſt the Stateſmen, Began to bee diuerſly affected among the Commons, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wiſedome of Dunſtan had not ſeene the chaſe; for a Councell being aſſembled to argue their rights, the Archbiſhop came in with his banner and Croſſe, and not ſtaying for further debating de iure, did de facto, preſent Prince Edward for their lawfull King, and the aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy-men, perſwading peace, drew the approbation of the reſt, and ſo was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their Soueraigne.

mongst his people, morraine of Cattle, and to their further terrour, a fearefull Comet appeared; which men thought to be signes from heauen, as sent from GOD, for the sinnes committed against the married Clergie, whose cause was much pitied, especially of the Nobles, and whose complaints of wrongs they instantly vrged, that without deserts they were expulsed from their ancient possessions; a thing which neither GOD nor good men euer allowed, and was contrary to the prescript rule of Christ, that wils vs to doe as wee would bee done vnto; whereto the Monkes answered, that Christ respected neither the person nor place, but onely them that tooke vp the Crosse of Penance and followed him, as themselues in their single life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incombrances of wiuing; for otherwise they would haue felt, that the condition of the married, was more truely a suffering of the Crosse and enduring of Penance.

(3) These Church-men thus diuided and rent, were diuersly sided as affection did moue, and that not onely of the meaner sort, but euen of the Nobles and great Ones; for the Mercian Duke ALFERVS fauouring the iust cause of married Priests, destroyed the Monasteries in his Prouince, cast out the Monkes, and restored againe the ancient reuenewes to them and their wiues: contrariwise, in East-Anglia the Priests went to wracke, where the Monkes were maintained by the authoritie of Edelwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the assistance of his brother Alfred, and of Brightnoth Earle of Essex, raised a mightie Armie, and stood with that power for their defence.

(4) The fire thus blowne from a sparke to a flame, was feared to mount higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, Armes laid aside, the cause was referred to bee heard in Councell, and at Winchester first the assembly was held, where after long dispute, and much against the Monkes, it was greatly suspected their side had gone downe, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roode, placed vpon on the refectory Wall, where the Councell sate. To this great Oracle Saint Dunstan desired them deuoutely to pray, and to giue diligent eare for an answere: who, with as great bountie, as they in deuotion, made it not squemish to giue them this aduice; God forbid it should bee so, God forbid it should be so (said he) you iudged well once, and to change that againe is not good.

Dunstans counsell.

This was authoritie sufficient to suppresse the Priests, who now with their wiues went downe the winde; and indeede too blame they were to suspect this their Iudge, who neuer was heard to giue wrong sentence before, but they vnsatisfied men, thought once more to blow the coales, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perswading the people, that this was but a subtile practise of the Monkes, in placing behinde the wall a man of their owne, who through a truncke vttered those words in the mouth of the Roode; it was therefore instantly desired, that the cause might once more come to scanning.

The Priests suspition of the Monkes.

(5) This lastly was granted, and a great assembly congregated at Clene in Wilt-shire, whither repaired the Prelates with most of the States of the Land, besides Gentlemen and Commons an innumerable sort.

This Synode being set; and the controuersie propounded, a hot and sharpe Disputation ensued, and a while was maintained with many bitter inuectiues; ill beseeming such persons: But whether through the weakenesse of the foundation, or the ouer-presse of weight, or both, the Ioysts of this vpper-loft, wherein the Councell was helde, suddainely brake, and downe fell the floore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and some slaine out-right, onely Archbishoppe DVNSTAN then President, and mouth for the Monkes, remained vnhurt: for the Post whereon his Chaire was set (and not without miracle) stood wholy vntouched.

A heauy mischance.

Polych lib. 6. cap. 13.

Thus by this fall, fell the cause of the secular Priests, and the Monkish foundations vnderpropped with more surer pillars, DVNSTAN vnburdened of many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monkes, Priests without cure, but not without care.

and the Priests at libertie now to accompanie their wiues without any cure, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the prouidence of DVNSTAN, and his strange preseruation on the post; no lesse wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beame of a house was sunke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the signe of the Crosse thereon with his fingers, he made it returne to his former place: so wonderfully potent was he in such wodden miracles. To which, why should wee not giue credite, since the very Harpe which he had touched, could worke miracles? as when of it selfe it sounded melodiously that Hymne, Gaudent in cœlis animæ Sanctorum, &c. Yea sith the blessed Virgin Mary her selfe, is said to haue come to solace him with her songs, Cantemus Domino Socia, &c. For, as for Angels singing familiarly vnto him, and Diuels in shape of Dogges, Foxes, and Beares, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewise his making the shee-diuell to roare, when comming to tempt him to dalliance in shape of a beautifull Lasse, he caught her by the nose with hote burning pincers, and so spoilde a good face. But to leaue those figments wherewith our Monkish Stories are stuffed, to the deluding of their Readers, and dishonouring of those, whom thereby they thinke to magnifie; let vs looke backe to young Prince Edward.

CHAPTER XLIIII.

Ethelred the sonne of King Edgar, and brother to King Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelue yeares entred his gouernment ouer the Englishmen, the yeare of mans Saluation, nine hundred seuentie nine, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch since King Hengist: he was crowned King at Kingston vpon Thamisis the foureteenth of Aprill, being Easter day, by the hands of Dunstan Arch-bishop of Canterburie, who did it much against his will.

(2) Hee was a man neither forward in action, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonly called the Vnreadie : his youth was ſpent in idleneſſe, feeding his ſenſes with all voluptuous baites ; his middle yeares with a careleſſe gouernment, maintaining ciuill diſſenſions ; and his latter end deſeruingly in continuall reſiſtance of the bloud-thirſtie Danes. With theſe imputations by Writers hee is taxed, though wee finde no ſuch iuſt cauſe in recording his life ; but to ſuch extreames are euen great Monarchs themſelues brought, that their breath and dignitie once left and laid downe, they are ſubiect to the cenſures of euery affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to ſuch mens humors, the working of DVNSTAN euer againſt him, is a ſufficient witneſſe, who not onely did refuſe to act his Coronation, but would haue preferred Lady Edgith a baſtard before him to the Crowne, as wee haue ſaid. And beſides the generall quarrell of the Monkes and married Prieſts, to which later himſelfe and his Abetters were better inclined ; his iuſt indignation conceiued againſt the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and that not pacified without the Biſhoppes ſubmiſſion and payment of money, was cauſe enough for thoſe Monkiſh Writers to brand the Lords Annointed with their markes of infamie, vnto whom they impute the miſeries of thoſe times, and the deſtruction of the ENGLISH by the intruding DANES.

(3) Theſe Danes had kept quiet euer ſince the diſliked raigne of King Edwy, without any notable attempts, for the ſpace of twentie two yeares: but now perceiuing the hearts of the ſubiects to be drawne from their Soueraigne, they thought it a ſufficient occaſion to forward their intendments ; and omitting no time, in the ſecond of his raigne with ſeuen ſhippes they arriued vpon the Coaſt of Kent, ſpoyling the Country ; but moſt eſpecially the Iland Thanet, from whence they did great hurt likewiſe to the towne of Southampton.

The Engliſh led in the diſlike of young Ethelreds Gouernment, were the rather drawne to impute theſe and other aduerſities to this vnfortunate Prince, by reaſon of a prediction of Dunſtan, who had propheſied, That they ſhould not bee free from bloud and ſword, till there came a people of an vnknowne tongue, that ſhould bring them to thraldome : and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of bloud and fire, immediately after his vnaffected Coronation.

(5) And theſe calamities were ſeconded with others as fearefull ; for in the yeare nine hundred eightie two the Citie London was miſerably deſtroyed and defaced by fire ; whoſe beautie then chiefly extended from Ludgate weſt-ward : for, that within the walles, and where the heart of the Citie is now, was then neither beautifull nor orderly built ; what time alſo raged a ſickneſſe till then vnknowne in England, which was a ſtrong burning Feuer, and bloudy Fluxe, as alſo ſcarſitie of victualles, and murraine among Cattle. This hand of God thus correcting the ſinnes of all, was receiued as ſent for the offences of ſome few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Raiſers ; Dunſtan ſtill propheſying further woe s to the Land, when himſelfe ſhould be dead.

Theſe euils King Ethelred could not redreſſe, his ſtrengths beeing ſmall, and his ſubiects affections leſſe; therefore calling to Counſell his Stateſmen and Peeres, demanded their aduice what was beſt to be done. Some few of theſe proffered the King their aſſiſtance, but more of them perſwaded vnto a compoſition, whereof Siricius Arch-biſhop of Canterburie was chiefe; and in fine, tenne thouſand pounds paid to the Danes for their departure.

strengthes repaired, but vnfortunately fought, and left the field to the Danes, who shortly after hoised their sayles, and with a merry gale arriued in Normandie.

An.D.1000 (13) King Ethelred thus rid of these his vnlooked for guests, sought to remoue those leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with sore warre wasted the Country; before whose sword the Danes were not able to stand; which somewhat encouraged the spirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towards him: but farre this Sunne past not without a cloud, nor was his succesſe entailde to be fortunate.

(14) For the next yeare, those Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandie with their full sayles, and landing in Exmouth, their first and greatest fury was against the Citie of Exceter, which when they fiercely besieged, they were so valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged aboue measure with the ignominy of that repulse, they thence as a sodaine floud bare downe all that stood in their way; and then plainely beganne to appeare the rise of the Danes, which euery where lorded it, where they had to doe; and the fall of the Saxons, whose ouer-topped Monarchy, and weake walles now wanted props to hold vp the weight; for the Captaines of the English (saith Higden) wanting lore in deedes of Armes, their direction neuer prospered; if shippes were made, they neuer sped well, but were either chased of the enemy, or destroyed by tempest; if the Nobles euer assembled to consult of the State, that time was rather spent in whetting the spleene each against other, then ioyntly agreeing how to redresse their present danger, or to represse the common enemy: for most of the Nobles were allianced into the Danish bloud, whereby not onely the secrets of those consultations were reuealed, but being imployed in seruice, many of them reuolted to the Enemy. The Clergie as backward as any, denyed the King their assistance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priuiledge of the Church, when the Land lay bleeding and deploring for helpe, and scandalized all his other proceedings for demanding their ayde: to these were ioyned scarsitie, hunger and robberies. These miseries caused the summes of their compositions to bee augmented, whose last was sixteene thousand, now twentie thousand, immediately twentie-foure, then thirtie, and lastly, fortie thousand pounds, vntill the Land was emptied of all the coyne; the Kingdome of her glory; the Nobles of courage; the Commons of their content, and the Soueraigne of his wonted respect and obseruance.

The effects of it.

(15) The Danes thus preuailing, did not a little glory in their fortunes; and grieued the poore English, whose seruice they imployed to eare and till the ground, whilest themselues sate idle, and eate the fruit of their paines, abusing the wiues and daughters of their Hosts where they lay, and yet in euery place for feare and reuerence were called the LORD-DANES, (which afterwards became a word of derision to such sturdy and lazie lozels) so that the like dayes of misery the Land neuer felt. To redresse which, the carefull King ETHELRED was farre too weake, and therefore intending to doe that by policie, which hee could not by strength, he deuised a desperate stratagem that proued the destruction of the Saxons royall bloud, and conquest of the land to another Nation.

Ethelreds bad policie.

(16) For seeking to disburden the Realme of these deuouring Danes, which by open force hee could no wayes doe; hee attempted in a bloudy massacre to destroy them, giuing a secret commission vnto euery Crtie within his Dominions, that at an appointed time they should set vpon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of Nouember, being the festiuall of Saint Bricius, the yeare of Christ Iesus 1002. and presently after his marriage with EMMA, the flower of Normandie; in confidence of which affinitie, hee presumed to doe what hee did. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the fearefull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of Saint Frideswide, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquitie and priuiledge among ancient Kings: but they in fury regarding neither place, nor person, set the Church on fire, wherein were Towardes the Winter the Danes tooke into the Ile of VVight, and in the deepeſt time thereof, paſſed through Hamp-ſhire, into Barke-ſhire, vnto Reading, Wallingford, Coleſey, and Eſſington, making cleane worke whereſoeuer they came; for that which they could not carry they conſumed with fire, with triumphs euer returning to their ſhippes.

The Danes in the Ile of Wight.

(20) The King lying in Shrewſbury, vnable to reſiſt, called to him his Councell, to conſult what was beſt to bee done; whereof Edrike was a principall, and in ſo high eſteeme with the King, that hee created him Duke of Mercia, and gaue him his daughter Edgith in marriage: notwithſtanding, theſe gluts of fauours wrought onely the diſgeſtion of falſhood in him, who could taſte nothing valeſſe it was ſauced with treaſon. This man, then the Kings onely Achitophell, perſwaded him to pay thirtie thouſand pounds to the Danes for their peace, whereof no doubt ſome fell into his owne Coffers.

Brithrik (chasing Wilmot) crossed by tempest.

(21) This intollerable imposition extorted of the Subiects, especially at that time when the Land was least able, made many suspect great matters against Edrik, and some did not feare to accuse him to his face, to bee the onely causer of this payment; charging him as ouer-affectioned to the Danes, and to haue bewrayed the Kings secrets and designes vnto them: but hee seated in the heart of his Soueraigne, rubd off this staine with a few fawnings, and a faire shew, beeing a man in wit subtle, in speech eloquent, and for riches inferiour to none, (a stone that could turne euen great streames aside) so that these suppofals of treasons (as proceeding from enuy to him for his good seruices) wonne him greater trust, and sent hee was Ambassadour to the Danes to mediate for peace: where reuealing the weakenesse of the Land, and feares which the English conceiued of a conquest, treacherously disswaded them from giuing eare to any motiues of Truce.

(22) The State of the Land thus standing, or rather hanging at suspence, King Ethelred gaue order, that out of euery three hundred and ten hides of Land a shippe should be built, and of euery eight hides a complete Armour furnished. These meeting at Sandwich, and furnished with Souldiers, made shew of such resistance, as had not beene seene, although the euent was nothing but a shew. For Wilmot a Noble-man of Sussex (banished for some offence by King Ethelred) with twentie sayles roued vpon the Coasts, and by Piracy did much hurt among the English Merchants: wherefore Brithrike the brother of Edrike, to winne himselfe honour, got the Kings consent to pursue this grand-Pirate, with fourescore sayle of the foresaid shippes, threatning to bring in Wilmot either dead or aliue: but his sayles being spread vnder a faire winde, a violent tempest suddenly arose, and outragiously droue his shippes vpon shore, where distressed and torne, their beaten huls lay vnable to recouer themselues, or the Sea: Wilmot taking aduantage of this present mis-hap, fell fiercely vpon them, and after much slaughter of their weather-beaten warders, set them all on fire; so that all this preparation prooued not onely vaine, but also very hurtfull.

Three Danish Captaines.

Money payd the Danes. Three thousand pound, saith Simon Dunelm.

(23) At the receipt of the said thirtie thousand pounds, the Danes departed, in semblance satisfied and friends with the English; but how long that lasted the sequele shewed: for the next haruest, and yeare of saluation one thousand and nine, a great Fleete of their shippes strongly appointed landed at Sandwich, vnder the conduct of three Danish Princes, Turkil, Henning, and Anlafe: these comming to Canterbury, were compounded with by the Citizens, paying a thousand pounds for their departure; who thence in the VVight, Sussex, and Hamp-shire made hauocke of all.

King Ethelred seeing no truth in their promises, nor quietnesse in State, his Land thus exhausted of prouision and coyne, thought it best to aduenture once for all, and to commit his cause vnto God, by the fortune of warre. To which end hee gathered his power, and comming vnlooked for, when the enemy was altogether vnprepared, and taken at disaduantage, hee had made an end of the quarrell if wicked Edrike had not perswaded him from fight, and put him into a causelesse feare with his forged tales. The Danes thus escaping returned to Kent, and the Winter following lodged their ships in the Riuer Thamesis, whence often they gaue assayes for London, though to little purpose.

(24) Then tooke they through the Chiltern wood vnto Oxford, which they fired, and in their returne wasted all the Countries on both sides of Thamesis; but hearing that London was prepared against them, they crossed ouer at Stanes, passing through Surrey into Kent, where they fell to amending their shippes, and thence sayling about the Coasts of Suffolke, tooke Ipswich, and pitched their battaile vpon Rigmer, against Vikel (Gouernour of Norfolke) and his English, vpon the fifth of May; where they wonne the day with a great slaughter made of the Suffolke, Norfolke, and Cambridge-shire men: and after harried those Countries with the borders of Lincolne and Huntingtonshires; burning Thetford and Cambridge, and rifling all the Abbies and Churches

(25) Neither reſted they there long in quiet, ere as people wholly deuoted to ſpoyle, they brake into Buckingham, Bedford, and Northampton ſhires, the chiefe Towne of which laſt, they ſet on fire after much ſlaughter of the Inhabitants; and thence entring Wiltſhire, depopulated all before them, which was the ſeuenth Shire in number that they had laid waſte like a ſolitude.

(26) And now not ſatisfied with ſpoyle nor bloud-ſpilling, they prepare a new expedition for Canterbury, and in September beleagered the Citie, which by treaſon of a Church-man they wonne, tooke Alphegus the Arch-Biſhop, and ſlew nine hundred Monkes and men of Religion, beſides many Citizens, without all mercy: for they tithed the captiue multitudes after an inuerted order, ſlaying all by nines, and reſeruing onely the tenth to liue: ſo that of all the Monkes in the Towne there were but foure ſaued, and of the lay people foure thouſand eight hundred, by which account Maſter Lambert collecteth that there dyed in this maſſacre fortie three thouſand and two hundred perſons.

(27) But King Swaine hearing of the diſſenſions and weakeneſſe of the Land, in the yeare of Grace, one thouſand and thirteene, with a great number of ſhippes arriued in the mouth of Humber, and entring Trent landed at Gainesborough; whoſe terrour ſtrucke ſo deepe into the Northumbrians conceits, that they with them of Lyndſey yeelded themſelues to the yoake of his ſubiection, for that now ouer all the North from Watlingſtreete hee raigned ſole King, and exacted pledges from them for their further obedience. From the North hee ſought to ſpread his wings further into the South, and leauing his ſonne Canute to take charge of his ſhippes, and new conquered Countries, ſped himſelfe through Mercia to Oxford and Winchester, bringing all vnder the power of his commaund: with which gales of his fortunes, hee was ſo puffed vp, that thinking nothing vnpoſſible for him and his Danes to doe, in the heat of his courage he came vnto London, and preſently begirt the walles with a ſtrait ſiege.

Simon Dunelm. Mat. Weſtminſt. Henry Hunt.

(28) In the Citie lay vnfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and vnder his pay Turkillus the Daniſh Prince before ſpoken of, and fortie-fiue Daniſh ſhippes to defend the Coaſts. King Swaine at his firſt comming fiercely aſſaulted the Citie, hoping his fortunes would haue proued as before; but the preſence of the King, and LONDON the eye of the Land, made the Citizens aboue meaſure couragious, who beat the Danes from their walles, and ſallying forth of the Gates, ſlew them on heapes, ſo that Swaine himſelfe was in great danger, had he not deſperately runne through the midſt of his enemies, and by flight eſcaped their ſwords; marching both day and night in great feare vntill hee had entred Bathe, where Ethelmere Earle of Deuon-ſhire, with his Weſterne people ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. But this laſt ouerthrow, and want of victualles, cauſed him after hee had receiued a certaine ſumme of money, to haſte into Denmarke, minding with more power, and better aduantage to proſecute the quarrell.

Will. Malmeſb. Mat. Weſt.

(29) Not long it was ere hee returned, and immediately was met by the Engliſh, where betwixt them was ſtruck a fierce battaile, which had beene with good ſucceſſe, had not the treaſons of ſome hindred it, in turning to the Danes. King Ethelred therefore ſeeing himſelfe, and Land betrayed in this manner, to thoſe few true Engliſh that were left, he vſed this ſpeech as followeth.

Paines taking for safetie.

(31) This lamentable Oration deliuered from the passions of a iustly-pensiue King, touched the hearers to the hearts, and as much distracted their afflicted mindes. To abide battaile they saw it was bootelesse, the treason of their Leaders so many times defeating their Victories; to yeeld themselues to the enemy, would but begin their seruitude and misery; and to flee before them, their eternall ignominy and reproach.

Thus their opinions were canuassed, but nothing put in practise, whereas meane whiles the Danes went forward with Victories, and had got the most part of the Land, yea and London also by submission; wherewith vnfortunate Ethelred more and more deiected, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, vnto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne safest refuge committed himselfe vnto Turkil the Dane, in whose shippes he remained a while at Greenewich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where he abode most part of the Winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leauing the Danes lording it in his Realme.

(32) These were the dayes of ENGLANDS mourning, shee being vnable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her deuourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruelly afflicted the land, like two mil-stones crushing and grinding the Graine. Swayn as an absolute King, extorted of the English, both victuals and pay for his souldiers: and Turkil on the other side, in defence of the English, commanded the like for his shippes and men, so that the Danes had all, and the English maintained all. Neither were Churches free from their spoyles, (whom other Conquerours haue held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swayn demaunded for the preseruation of Saint Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke: which because the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatned spoyle both to the place, and to the Martyres bones there enterred: in the midst of which iollitie (saith Houeden) hee suddainely cryed out that hee was strucke by Saint Edmund with a sword, being then in the middest of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came, and so with great horrour and torment, three dayes after vpon the third of February ended his life at Thet- ford (others say, at Gainesborough:) but with his death dyed not the title of the Danes, who immediately aduanced Canutus his sonne for their King.

An. D. 1015 (33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially vnder such tyrannizing intruders, thought now or neuer the time to shake off the yoake; and therefore with great ioy and haste sent into Normandy for their natiue King. Ethelred now not vnreadie for the recouering of his right, foreslowed no meanes either to hasten or strengthen the enterprize, and hauing the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in ENGLAND, vnto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their greatest ioy to see the face of their King.

Canutus winneth loue of the English. (34) Canutus then at Gainesborough, Souldier-like mustered and managed his men, and holding it good policie to keepe that by bountie, which his Father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English; by which meanes those of Lindsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to finde him both horse and men against their own King and Country.

He is chased by Ethelred. Ethelred therefore now raging for reuenge, with a mightie Host entered Lindsey, where he burnt all the Country, and put the Inhabitants to the sword. Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the Sea more safe for him then the Land, and entring Humber, sayled to Sandwich, where being sore grieued at the miseries of these his confederates, requited King Ethelreds friends with the like, and commanded that those pledges which had beene deliuered by the Nobles vnto his Father, should haue their noses slit, and their hands cut off: which crueltie acted, hee sayled to Denmarke, as hopelesse of any good issue in England.

Turkil inciteth Canutus against England. (35) But Turkill the Dane, retained (as wee said) into King Ethelreds pay, seeing successe so sodainely altered, sore repented him of his reuolt from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recouer his reputation, with nine of his shippes sayled into Denmarke, instantly importuning Canute to addresse againe for England; alledging the feares and weakenesse of the people, the beautie and fertilitie of the Land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren seate, and (which did most moue) himselfe would assist, when the English least thought it. With these and the like he spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full curriere.

Canutus and his Nauie. Canutus therefore with the ayde of his brother Harrold rigged forth a Nauie of two hundred sayle, all furnished with souldiers and abiliments of warre, whose terrour landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was; and to encrease the terrour of this fearefull enemy, the Sea with a Spring-tyde brake into this Land, and destroyed both Townes and many Inhabitants; a signe foreshewing (as was thought) the successe of that Fleete, borne hitherward vpon those waues; and to increase the Englishs miseries, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute, to pay the Danish auxiliary Nauie lying before Greenewich. The States also conuening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine vpon the great affaires of the Kingdome, were diuided into factions, and two Noble-men of the Danes there murthered by practise of Edrick the Traytor. These (I say) were accounted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and euery shadow the shew of an enemy.

Money collected for the Danes.

Neither did Canute for his part ſpare the Kings ſubiects, but through Buckingham, Bedford, Huntington, Nottingham, Lincolne, and Yorke-ſhires, made ſpoyle of all, ſo that the miſerable Engliſh went to wracke on all ſides; in ſo much that Vtred alſo forſaking Edmund, became ſubiect to Canute: whereupon Edmund haſted to London to ioyne his ſtrength with his Fathers, and Canute with no leſſe ſpeed ſayled about the Coaſts into Thameſis, preparing his Army for the ſiege of London.

Very louing and tender affectioned hee was to his brother King Edward; for whoſe death he made ſuch lamentation, that his Mother beate him with a Taper of Waxe that ſtood before her, yea, and ſo ſore that hee could neuer after well endure the ſight of a Taper. Fauourable hee was to the married Prieſts, and leaſt eſteemed the opulent and idle liues of the Monkes, whoſe Pennes therefore (as in ſuch caſes wee euer finde them partiall) haue beene very lauiſh in his diſprayſe, accuſing him with ſloath and vnreadineſſe of Armes, of voluptuouſneſſe and lechery, couetouſneſſe, pride, and crueltie: whereas in following the records of his life, laying aſide the Daniſh maſſacre, wee finde no ſuch ſinnes, neither any mention of Concubine that euer hee kept, or name of childe vnlawfully begot, hauing had many by his wiues, which were as followeth.

Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 13.

His Wiues.

Elgiua the firſt wife, by ſome called Elfleda.

(40) Elgiua, the firſt wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of an Engliſh Duke named Thored, who is reported in the Hiſtory of that time, to haue done great ſeruice againſt the Danes. Shee was married vnto him when hee was ſeuenteene yeares of age, in the ſixth of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace nine hundred eightie-foure, and was his wife ſeuenteene yeares, who deceaſed in the twentie foure of his raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, one thouſand and three.

Emme the ſecond wife.

(41) Emme, the ſecond wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Richard the ſecond, Duke of Normandie, and ſiſter of Duke Richard, and Duke Robert, Father to William the Conquerour; her mother was ſiſter to Herfaſt the Dane, Grand-father of William liam Fitz-Osbert afterward Earle of Hereford. Shee was a Lady of passing beautie, and therefore commonly called the flower of Normandy, married vnto him in the twentie and fifth yeare of his raigne, and yeare of Saluation, one thousand and three; with whom shee liued thirteene yeares, and suruiuing him was remarried to King Canute the Dane.

His Issue.

Ethelstan the eldest sonne.

(42) Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgina his first Wife, was borne about the eight yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeare of Christ, 986. he liued vnto the age almost of twentie fiue years, being then (by great likelihood) cut off by vntimely death in the wars of the Danes, raging then most extreamely, which was the thirtie third of his Fathers raigne, and of Christs Natiuity 1011.

Egbert the second sonne.

(43) Egbert, the second sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgina his first wife, seemeth to haue beene borne two yeares after his brother Ethelstan, in the tenth yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeare of our Lord 988. and to haue deceased in the very prime of his youth before the death of his Father, or of his elder brother, and before he had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

Edmund the third sonne.

(44) Edmund, the third son of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was borne in the eleuenth yeare of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989. and of all his Fathers children prooued to be the onely man that set his helping hand to the redresse of the estate of his Country distressed by the miserable oppressions of the Danes: which hee pursued with such exceeding toile, and restlesse hazards of his body, as he was therefore surnamed Iron-side; and when he had followed those wars with great courage the space of seuenteene yeares vnder his Father, being come to twenty seuen of his owne age, he succeeded him in his Kingdome and troubles, as presently shall be shewed.

Edred the fourth sonne.

(45) Edred, the fourth son of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was borne about the fourteenth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, being the yeare of Grace 992. His name is continually set downe, as a witnesse in the testees of his Fathers Charters, vntill the thirtie-fifth yeare of his Raigne, by which it appeareth that he liued vnto the two and twentieth yere of his owne age, although I find no mention of him, nor of any thing done by him in any of our Histories; and it seemeth hee dyed at that time because his name is left out of the Charters after that yeare.

Edwy the fifth sonne.

(46) Edwy, the fifth sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgina his first wife, suruiued his Father and all his brethren, and liued in the raigne of Canute the Dane, who being iealous of his new gotten estate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew vnto him by this Edwy, and such others of the English bloud royall, practised to haue him murthered; which was accordingly done by them, whom he most fauoured, and least suspected, the yeare of our saluation 1017.

Edgar the fixth sonne.

(47) Edgar, the sixt sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was borne about the twentieth yeare of his Fathers raigne, being the yeare of our Lord God nine hundred ninetie and eight. He seemeth by the Testes of his Fathers Charters, to haue beene liuing in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but being no more found in any of them after, may be supposed by all coniectures, to haue dyed in, or about the same yeare, being but the eleuenth after his owne birth, and the seuenth before his Fathers death.

The eldest daughter.

(48) The eldest daughter of King Ethelred and Queen Elgina his first wife, although her name be not to be found in any writer of those times, appeareth notwithstanding, to be married to one Ethelstan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridge-shire men at the great battaile fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the English-men had the ouerthrow; and this son in law of King Ethelred, with the rest of the chiefe Leaders, were slaine in the yeare of Christs Natiuity 1010. being the two and thirtieth of his Father in Lawes raigne.

Edgith the second daughter.

(49) Edgith, the second daughter of King Ethelred and Queen Elgina his first wife, was married to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his couetousnesse in getting, was surnamed Streattone: This Edrik was the sonne of one Egelrik surnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egelmere the Grand-father of Godwin Duke of the West-Saxons; and beeing but meanely borne, was thus highly aduanced by this King; notwithstanding he was euer a traytor to his Country, and a fauourer of the Danes, betraying both him and King Edmund his son to King Canute, that he thereby might get new preferments by him, who worthily rewarded him as a traitor, and put him to death.

Elfgine the third daughter.

(50) Elfgine, the third daughter of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgiua his first wife, was the second wife of Vtred surnamed the Bold, sonne of Earle Waldese the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom shee had one onely childe, a daughter, named Aldgith, married to a Noble-man called Maldred, the sonne of Crinan; shee was mother of Gospatricke, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his displeasure to flie into Scotland, where he abode, and was ancestor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Country.

Gode the fourth daughter.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgina his first wife, was first married to one Walter de Maigne a Noble-man of Normandie, greatly fauoured by King Edward her brother, who liued not long after the marriage, and left issue by her a son named Rodulfe, whom King Edward his Vncle created Earle of Hereford. This Earle Rodulfe died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeare of his Vncles Raigne, and was buried at Peterborough, leauing issue a young sonne named Harrald, created afterwards by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Glouceſter, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudeley now beeing. This Lady Gode, after the decease of the said Walter de Maigne, was married to Eustace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne in Picardy, a man of great valour in those parts of France, and a most faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grand-father to Godfrey of Bulloigne, King of Ierusalem, albeit it seemeth he had no issue by this Lady.

Edward the seuenth sonne

(52) Edward, the seuenth sonne of King Ethelred, and his first by Queene Emme his second wife, was borne at Islipe in the Countie of Oxford, and brought vp in France all the time of his youth, with his Vncle Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandie, mistrusting his safetie in England vnder King Canute the Dane, although he had married his mother; but he found the time more dangerous by the vsage of his brother Elfred, at his being here in the raigne of King Harrald sonne of the Dane. Notwithstanding, hee returned home, when Hardiknut the other sonne (beeing his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably receiued and entertained by him, and after his death succeeded him in the Kingdome of England.

Elfred the eight sonne.

(53) Elfred, the eight sonne of King Ethelred, and his second by Queene Emme his second wife, was conueyed into Normandie for feare of King Canute, with his eldest brother Edward, and with him returned into England to see his mother, then beeing at Winchester, in the second yeare of King Harrald surnamed Harefoote; by whose practize he was trained towards London, apprehended by the way at Guilford in Surrey, depriued of his eye-sight, and committed prisoner to the Monastery of Elie: his Normans that came with him most cruelly murthered, and he himselfe soone after deceasing, was buried in the Church of the said Monasterie.

CHAPTER XLV.

EDMVND, the third ſonne of King Ethelred, and the eldeſt liuing at his Fathers death, ſucceeded him both in his Dominions, and in his troubled Eſtate againſt the Danes; entring his Gouernment in the moneth of Aprill, and was crowned at Kingſton vpon Thameſis, by Liuingus Arch-biſhop of Canterburie, the yeare of mans ſaluation, one thouſand and ſixteene. Notwithſtanding, a great part of the Engliſh, conſidering the puiſſance of the Danes, both feared and fauoured Canute, eſpecially, a great part of the Clergie, who at Southampton ordained him their King, ſwearing to him the fealtie of true ſubiection; but the Londoners ſtood moſt firme to Prince Edmund, and were principall Actors for his election. Polyth. lib. 6. cap. 17.

who had beſieged the Citie before the death of King Ethelred, cauſed his ſhips now to be towed, and drawne vp the Thameſis vnto the Weſt ſide of the bridge, and from the Riuer with a deepe and large Trench encompaſſed the Citie, ſhutting vp all entrance or egreſſe of any. But the Citizens manfully ſtood in reſiſtance, whereto the comming of their new King for their ſuccour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes; who now thought it beſt to breake vp their ſiege and be gone: and the rather (ſaith the Author of Encomium Emmæ) for that King Edmund ſent Canute a peremptory challenge of ſingle combate, which he neither accepted, nor yet ſtayed the ſiege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors ſayled along the Coaſt to the Ile of Sheepie, where he wintred with his Nauie and men.

Proffer of ſingle combat.

(3) But loath to loſe opportunitie, when time ſerued for warre; on the ſodaine he aſſailed the Weſt of England, and brought much of thoſe parts vnder his command: to meete whom, the reſtleſſe Iron-ſide prepared, and with ſuch ſmall power as his leaſure would admit to leauy, he haſted into Dorſet-ſhire, where Canute was forwarding his owne fortunes, and at Penham neere Gillingham, each met other in the field, wherein a ſore battaile was fought, and bloudy to the Danes, where many of them were put to the ſword, and the reſt to flight.

(4) Canute immediately tooke into Wincheſter to ſecure himſelfe from danger, and the reſt eſcaped towards Salisbury, and there begirt the Citie with a ſtrait ſiege. King Edmund as ready to ſaue, as they to deſtroy, made preſently thitherward with his ſmall and ouer-tired company; whom Canute, waiting for aduantage, followed with a great hoaſt, and in Worceſter-ſhire at a place called Sheroſtan, in the ſight of his enemy pitched his battaile. To the ayde of Edmund came many of the Engliſh, ſo that his Army was greatly encreaſed, and their courages inhaunſed, which made the Daniſh ſouldiers ſomewhat to droope.

Simon Dunelm. Matt. West.

(6) But their bloud not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no leſſe courage then before, till at length the Danes were going downe, and the Engliſh in great forwardneſſe of victory: which when the Traytour Edrik perceiued, hee cut off the head of a ſouldier, whoſe name was Oſmearus, like vnto King Edmund both in haire and countenance, and ſhaking his bloudy ſword with the halfe-gaſping head, cryed vnto the hoaſt of the Engliſh: Flie yee wretches, flie, and get away, for your King is ſlaine, behold, here is his head, therefore ſeeke now to ſaue your owne liues.

Will. Malmesb. Edriks treaſon.

(7) But Edmund hauing preſent notice of this treacherous ſtratageme, and ſeeing his men ready to giue ouer the fight, haſted himſelfe where he might be beſt ſeene, encouraging his Army to ſtand to it like true Engliſhmen, and poſting from ranke to ranke, both performed the parts of a wiſe Generall, and vnder-went the dangers of the meaneſt ſouldier: his men ſeeing his preſence, and the apparant treachery of Duke Edrik, bent their bowes againſt the traitour, and had ſhot him to death, had hee not preſently auoyded to the enemy; but the night approaching, parted againe the battle of this ſecond day: Duke Edrik excuſing his fact, as being meerely miſtaken in the countenance of the man, and thirſting to ſaue the bloud of the Engliſh, was taken againe into fauour, and bare himſelfe outwardly faire for his Country.

Edriks excuſe.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battaile, but yet ſtood ſtill without any attempt, onely refreſhing their wearied, and almoſt tired bodies, and burying the dead ſlaine in the two dayes fights before.

(9) The night following, Canutus in great ſilence brake vp his Campe, and marched very faſt towards LONDON, againſt whoſe Citizens he carried great ſpleene, and moſt earneſtly deſtred the conqueſt of the City, which in a ſort was ſtill beſieged by the Daniſh ſhippes.

Canute marcheth to London.

(10) The Centinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addreſſing himſelfe for the battaile) of the ſuddaine departure of his enemies, whereupon hee as ready to preuent their deſignes, followed them by tract euen vnto London: where with ſmall adoe doe, he remooued their ſiege, and entred the Citie in manner of triumph. The Danes thus diſcomfited, great hope was conceiued, that theſe faire proceedings would haue a proſperous end.

(11) Edmund, therefore following the aduantage of their diſcouragements, two dayes after at Brentford bad them battaile, and that with their great ouerthrow; notwithſtanding, in paſſing the Thameſis at the ſame place, he loſt many of his men, who were drowned before they could recouer the ſhore: vpon which loſſe the Traytor Edrike played, who earſt had much feared the downfall of the Danes. For hereupon he perſwaded his Brother in law King Edmund to come to truce with Canute, which as he confidently affirmed, ſhould be to the great benefit and contentment of Edmund: Canute himſelfe ſo plotting it, that by his meanes he might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

Edriks wicked counſell.

Henry Hunt.

(12) The affaires thus ſtanding, King Edmund returned into the Weſt, and Canute with ſpoyles vnto his ſhips that were in Medyway, not farre from Rocheſter, where he a while lay ſtill to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariwiſe louing nothing leſſe then to linger his buſineſſes, made preparation againſt thoſe truce-breakers that had waſted the Country in their returne, and with a great Army entred Kent, where he pitched downe his tents neere vnto Oteford.

Edmunds preparations.

Canute, who had prepared himſelfe in moſt warlike array to meete his approach, beganne the battaile in a furious manner, which continued very bloudy for foure houres ſpace, vntill the foote of his vaward beganne to ſhrinke, which when he perceiued, he drew his horſemen for their ayde; but whileſt the one gaue haſtily backe, and the other made as ſlowly forward, the array of the whole Army was broken, and the Danes ſlaine on all hands: for it is reported that Canute loſt foure thouſand fiue hundred men, and King Edmund only ſix hundred; the reſt of theſe Danes truſting to their legs: whom if Edmund had purſued in chaſe, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt thoſe two Nations for euer. But Deſtiny, that would haue the Saxons downe, who had raiſed themſelues by the fals of the Britaines, made Edrike her inſtrument, and mall of the Engliſh, who kept King Edmunds haſty foot from following his enemies, by guilefull vrging the danger of ambuſh, and the ouer-wearied bodies of his ſouldiers, ſo that Canute thereby had leaſure in ſafetie to paſſe ouer into Eſſex.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increaſe of his power to deſpoile all the Country before him, brought feare to the Inhabitants, and to himſelfe ſubmiſſion of many Engliſh. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherward, and at Aſhdone three miles from Saffron Walden gaue battaile to Canute, wherein a bloudy ſlaughter enſued, though a while with equall chance of foile or of victory, vntil laſtly the Danes began to giue backe; which when the euer-traiterous Edrik perceiued, hee went with his ſtrength, vnto their ſide, and maintained their battaile, which otherwiſe was at point to be loſt, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betrayed Engliſh, the ouerthrow. There died of Edmunds Nobility Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwin, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwin, and Earle Vrchell, with Cadnoth Biſhop of Lincolne, and Wolſey Abbot of Ramſey, beſides other of the Clergie that were come thither to pray for the preſeruation of the King and his Army. The remembrance of which field is retained vnto this day, by certaine ſmall Hilles there remaining, whence haue beene digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chaines of horſe-bridles.

(14) King Edmund thus trayterouſly forced to retire from the field, on foote marched vnto Glouceſter with a very ſmall Army, leauing Canute ouer-ſwollen in conceit for this his great victory, vnto whom then the Londoners ſubmitted, and ſo did many other great Townes of name; after which hee followed Edmund into the Weſt; who now like a Tygar robbed of her whelpes, ſeeking the reuenge of his loſt day, gathered a moſt puiſſant Army, meaning to trie the vttermoſt chance of Fate, or battaile. Their Hoaſts meete at Dearhurſt neere vnto the Riuer Seuerne, where they were reſoluedly bent to eſtabliſh the ones title with the others downefall; and now beeing readie to ioyne, a certaine Captaine of vncertaine name, ſtepped forth (as is reported) betwixt the two

Mat. Weſt.

(16) Some affirme that this ſpeech was Duke EDRIKS; But I hardly beleeue ſo good a motion ſhould proceede from ſo bad a man. By whom ſo euer vttered, it was acceptably receiued by Edmund and Canute, who thereupon in ſight of their Armies, entred into a ſmall Iland, embraced about with the armes of Seuerne, called Alney, adioyning vnto the Citie Glouceſter, where thoſe Princes in complete Armour at firſt aſſailed each other moſt dangerouſly on horſebacke, and after as valiantly on foote. The Iron-ſide was ſtrong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not ſo tall, but euery way as ſtout, fought for his honour, and ſo the combate continued with an abſolute reſolution, till at length Canute hauing receiued a dangerous wound, and ſeeing himſelfe ouer-matched in ſtrength, wiſhed a comprimiſe, and thus ſpake to Edmund with a loud voyce.

Canute to Edmund.

Whereupon they both caſt downe their ſwords, imbracing as friends with the great ioy and ſhouting of both their Armies, who ſtood before doubtfully wauering betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortunes, according to the ſucceſſe of their Champions.

The Kingdome parted betweene them.

Thus was the Kingdome diuided betwixt thoſe two Princes; Edmund enioying that part that lay coaſted vpon France, and Canute entring vpon the reſt.

Edmund murthered.

(17) Thus then the Saxon Monarchy ſpent to the laſt period, and their tottering Crowne faſt graſped with a hard Daniſh hand, was ſuddainely torne from the Irons-ſides helmet, by his complotted and haſtned death. For Duke Edrick a very compound of treaſons, glutted with the fauours of both theſe Kings, to ſcrue himſelfe deeper into Canute his conceit, contriued the end of renowned Edmund: who beeing retired to a place for natures neceſſitie, was thruſt from vnder the draught into his body with a ſharpe Speare; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his Soueraignes head, preſented it to Canute, with theſe fawning ſalutations: All haile, thou now ſole-Monarch of England; for, here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy ſake I haue aduentured to cut off.

A Spit, ſaith Higden.

Canute, though ambitious enough of ſoueraignтie, yet of Princely diſpoſition, abaſhed, and ſore grieued at ſo vnworthy and diſloyall an attempt, replied, and vowed, that in reward of that ſeruice, the bringers owne head ſhould be aduanced aboue all the Peeres of his Kingdome. Which high honour whiles this prodigious wretch greedily expected, (and indeed for a time, ſaith Malmeſbury, hee found ſome ſhew of fa-

Old Manuſc. Fabian. Ran. Higden.

(18) The trayterous death of this worthy Prince, as ſome affirme, was acted at Oxford; yet the Author that wrote Encomium Emmæ, and liued the ſame time, blancheth the matter, ſaying, that he died a naturall death in London: God minding his owne doctrine, that a Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe, cannot long ſtand; and pittying the Engliſh, tooke away Edmund, leaſt if the Kings had continued long together, they ſhould both haue liued in danger, and the Realme in continuall trouble.

Simeon Dunelm. Maria. Scotus. Edmunds raigne. Polycbr.

That he dyed in London, Simon the Monke of Durham agreeth, and ſaith further; it chanced about the Feaſt of Saint Andrew: and Marianus is of the ſame opinion, being the yeare of Chriſt, one thouſand and ſixteene. Whenſoeuer, or howſoeuer, his raigne was but ſeuen moneths; and his body buryed at Glaſtenbury neer to his grandfather King Edgar.

The ſeature of Edmund.

(19) He was of perſonage tall, for courage, hardy, ſtrong of limmes, and well could endure the trauels of warre, in ſo much that ſome deeme the ſurname Iron-ſide, giuen him onely vpon that occaſion. With him fell the glory of the Engliſh, and the aged body of their ſore bruiſed Monarchy ſeemed to be buried with him in the ſame Sepulchre.

His Wife.

Algith.

(20) Algith, the wife of King Edmund, was the widow of Sigeferth, the ſonne of Engrin a Daniſh Noble-man of Northumberland; which Sigeferth, with his brother Morcar, was murthered at Oxford by the treaſon of the neuer-faithfull Edrick: and this Lady being of great beauty, and noble parentage, after the death of her husband, and the ſeiſure of his lands, was by King Ethelred committed in charge to the Monaſtery of Malmesbury, where Edmund ſeeing her, grew in great loue, and there married her againſt the liking of his Father, in Anno 1015.

His Iſſue.

Edward the out-law.

(21) Edward the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and Queene Algith his wife, was ſurnamed the Outlaw, becauſe he liued out of England in Hungary as a baniſhed man, through the raigne of Cannte, and of his ſonnes the Danes. But when his Vncle King Edward the Confeſſor, had obtained the Engliſh Crowne, he was by him recalled, and moſt honourably in his Court entertained, till laſtly, hee was taken away by death in the Citie of LONDON, the yeare of CHRIST, one thouſand fiftie ſeuen. He married Agatha ſiſter to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour HENRY the ſecond; by whom he had Edgar, ſurnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparant by Edward Confeſſor, his great Vncle; which title notwithſtanding, proceeded no further, for that he was depriued thereof by Harold his Protector.

His wife.

His daughters.

The daughters of this Edward, as after ſhall bee ſaid, were Margaret and Chriſtian, the yonger of which became a vailed Nunne at Ramſey in Hamp-ſhire, where ſhee in that deuotion ſpent her life, and was there interred.

Margaret the elder, and afterward ſole heire vnto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonly called Canmore: from which Princely bed in a lineall deſcent, our high and mightie Monarch, King IAMES the firſt, doth in his moſt royall perſon vnite the Britaines, Saxons, Normans, and Scotiſh Imperiall Crownes in one.

Edmund.

(22) Edmund, the ſecond and yongeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Algith his wife, after his Fathers deceaſe being a Childe, was with his brother Edward ſent by Cannte to Olaue King of Sweden his halfe-brother, to the intent, that he by murther ſhould make them both away: but this King taking pittie on the innocent Childrens eſtate, ſent them to Salomon King of Hungary, to the intent to haue them ſaued, where they were receiued with great fauour and honour: and Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth, that this Prince married the daughter of the ſame King; and other Writers of theſe times, that he dyed in the ſame Country without any iſſue of his body.

Matth. West.

(23) Theſe two ſons of the Iron-ſide thus poſted away, and the crown already ſet vpon the Danes head, had not the meanes of themſelues to diſplace it, nor the Engliſh, hearts to aſſiſt them to their right: ſo that they rather ſecured themſelues from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was vnrecouerable; and left the Danes quietly to poſſeſſe the Land, which ſo long they had moleſted with their ſturdy Armes.

CHAPTER I.

THE Spirit of GOD, in his ſacred writings, to ſhew His all-commanding power ouer Kingdoms, and Nations, compareth the tranſmigrations of people from Country to Country, vnto the transfuſion of Wine from veſſell to veſſell: and thoſe that are at reſt with ſinne, to be ſetled vpon their lees, as Moab was, againſt whom he curſed that hand that negligently did his worke of reuenge, and the ſword that was not ſheathed in their bloud. Euen ſo the ſinnes of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were ſuncke vnto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne veſſels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red and bloudy Wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gaue them the Cup of his wrath, whoſe dregs he had formerly (by their owne hands) wrung out vpon other Nations.

(2) For theſe Saxons that had enlarged their Kingdomes by the bloud of the Britaines, and built their neſts high vpon the Cedars of others, as (the Prophet ſpeaketh) committed an euill couetouſneſſe vnto their owne habitations, and were ſtricken by the ſame meaſure that they had meaſured vnto others. When as the Danes often attempting the Lands inuaſion, and the ſubuerſion of the Engliſh eſtate, made way with their ſwords through all the Prouinces in the realme; and laſtly aduanced the Crowne vpon their owne helmets; which whiles it ſo ſtood, was worne with great honour, eſpecially of Canutus the firſt and their greateſt.

(3) As touching this Nations originall, and firſt place of reſiding, ſeeing themſelues know nothing at all, we cannot determine, but ſuppoſing them, with Franciſcus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germans, and knowing them by the teſtimonies of all others, to inhabite in the ſame Country among them; wee need not to doubt, but that their conditions and cuſtomes were much alike. Of the former, what we haue obſerued, is already ſet downe, where we ſpake of our Saxons; and now of theſe later, what is ſuppoſed for truth ſhall be produced.

And. Velleius. Dudo S. Quin.

(4) Theſe Danes ſo often mentioned by our Hiſtorians, for the great afflicters of the Engliſh ſtate and peace, were a people deſcended from the Scythians, as Andrew Velley a learned Daniſh Writer reporteth: but Dudo of S. Quintin (an ancient Author) will haue them to come frō Scandia, an Iland ſituated North-ward not farre from the Continent of Denmarke: which his opinion ſeemeth vnto ſome to be ſtrengthned by Ptolemie the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Dauciones (the ſuppoſed Anceſtors of thoſe Danes) in this Iland Scandia, at ſuch time as himſelfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrian the Emperour, and about the yeare of Chriſts natiuitie 133. But whereſoeuer the roote had beginning, the branches did farre ſpread themſelues into the vpper Germany, and parts of Norway, and Sweyden, whoſe faire fruit more particularly filled that Promontory, which tongue-like lieth into the Ocean on the North, being anciently called of the learned, Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus, where, (as Tacitus ſaith) was the vttermoſt end of Nature, and of the world; a ſtrange conceit indeed; and yet more ſtrange was their opinion, who were perſwaded that the ſound and noiſe of the Sunne was there heard at his daily riſing and ſetting in thoſe Seas. But from more warrantable witneſſes it is reported, that this was the very place which the Iutes and Angles abandoned, when they remoued their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes laid firſt the foundation of their Kingdome; which, from the word Marc (ſignifying not a limit, but a region,) was named Den-marc. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and originall occaſion is not ſo ſoone found out: for the ſearching eye of Truth hath long ſince ſeene into the receiued fable of Danus their firſt King, and Giant-like ſonne of Humblus; though Verſtegan, of late, holds it more certaine in the ſearch of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at randome to ſeeke them elſwhere: as theſe Danes (ſaith he) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute; which truly for truth I hold much alike, and will herein make doubt, as many more of riper iudgement before me haue done.

Ethelward our Engliſh Hiſtorian will haue them named from the faire Citie Donia. And Ionas Iacobus Venuſinus, a diligent ſearcher of Antiquities, out of Pomponius Mela, findeth the names of certaine Bays, opening into thoſe parts, which now the Danes inhabite, to haue beene anciently written CDAN and CDANONVM; which Orthographie and Pronunciation to the Latines was both harſh and hard, and therefore they added a vowell, and wrote it CODANVM and CODANONIA, whereof (it may be thought) theſe people, giuen much to piracies, were known and called by that name, as breaking out of thoſe Codanian ſeas. Some others, from Ptolemie, haue thought, that from his Dauciones places in Scandia, and corruptly ſo written for Danciones; the name of theſe Danes hath beene deriued; whereto the neereneſſe of the place induceth much.

THE DANES FIRST ATTEMPTS AGAINST ENGLAND.

CHAPTER II.

An.Do.787

THough many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of Frãce and this our Iland in former times; yet their arriuall here, which gaue first breath to their ensuing Conquests, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchy, about the yeare of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred eighty seuen, in the raigne of Brightrik King of the West-Saxons: in whose dominions (after some proffer at Portland) they first came to land at Teigne-mouth in Deuonshire; being sent then with three Shippes onely, to espie the wealth of this Country, the Forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Hauens, and aduantage of arriuall for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieutenant and Prefect for that place, vnderstãding of their landing, went himselfe to demand the reason thereof; and attempting to lay hands on some, to carry them to the Kings presence, hee was there slaine; which they tooke as a fortunate presage of the victories wherwith they afterward ouer-ran this Kingdome; though for the present the Inhabitants inraged with the losse of their Chieftain, addressing them in great numbers to reuenge, forced some to lose their liues by the sword, the rest to saue themselues by flight to their ships.

Cambden in Danmonijs. John Stow. Lam. in Peram. mentioneth their Landing at Tyne-mouth in the North, the neerenesse of the name (it seemes) deceiued him.

(2) Notwithstanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert; whose raigne (as elsewhere we haue touched) they disquieted with three seuerall inuasions; the first in the North, the second in Wales, the last in Kent; in all which, the King, though with many losses, and hazards of his owne person, yet with great resolutions persisted, till hee had disburdened his Land of so dangerous guests. But those Flesh-flies hauing once tasted the sweet, though often beaten off, would not long bee kept away, but could easily take, or make occasions of fresh attempts; insomuch that after their first footing they continued here their cruelties, rapine, and spoyle the space of two hundred and eighteene yeares, neuer intermitting, till they had got the garland vpon their owne heads. The way whereunto was made vpon this ensuing occasion.

(3) Osbright a Northumbrian Viceroy, deputed by the West-Saxons, by chance, as hee followed his disport in Hunting, came to the house of a Nobleman, named Beorn-Bocador, whose Lady of passing feature (in his absence) gaue him honourable entertainement, and intreated both himselfe and traine, to repose themselues there a while, after their wearisome delights. The Vice-roy already ensnared with her beautie, accepted her courteous offer, not so much to taste her meates, as to surfeit his eyes with her rare beauty, and lasciuiously to dote in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, (as though some weighty matters were to be handled) hee commaunded an auoydance from the Presence, and taking the Lady into a with-drawing Chamber, vnder pretence of secret cõference, greatly tending to the aduancement of her Lord and selfe, most vnnobly, being not able to preuaile by smooth perswasions, did by force violate her constant chastity. Which dishonour thus receiued, and her minde distracted, like to Thamars, at her husbands returne, all ashamed to behold hold his face whose bed had so beene wronged, with flouds of teares she thus set open the sluces of her passions.

" (4) Had thy fortunes accorded to " thine owne desert, or thy choice pro- " ceeded as by vow was obliged, then " had no staine of blemish touched thine " honour, nor cause of suspition once ap- " proched thy thought: or had my selfe " beene my selfe, these blushing cheekes " had not inuited thy sharpe piercing " eye to looke into my guiltie and de- " filed breast, which now thou maist see " disfurnished of honour, and the closet " of pure chastity broken vp; onely the " heart and soule is cleane, yet feares the " tainture of this polluted caske, and " would haue passage (by thy reuenging " hand) from this loathsome prison and " filthy truncke. I must confesse our sexe " is weake, and accompanied with ma- " ny faults, yet none excuseable, how " small soeuer; much lesse the greatest, " which shame doth follow, and inward " guilt continually attend; yours, is crea- " ted more inuiolable and firme, by " whose constancy as our flexible weak- " nesse is guarded, so our true honours " by your iust Armes should be pro- " tected. O Beorn, Beorn, (for husband I " dare not call thee) reuenge therefore " my wrongs, that am now made thy " shame, and scandall of my sexe, vpon " that monster, nay Diuell, Osbright, (O " that very name corrupts my breath, " and I want words to deplore my " griefe) who hath no law but his lust, " nor measure of his actions but his " power, nor priuiledge for his loath- " some life, but his greatnesse, whiles we " with a selfe-feare, and seruile flatterie " maske our basenesse with crouching " obedience, and beare the wrongs of " his most vile adulteries. Thou yet art " free from such deiected and degenerate " thoughts, nor hast thou smoothed him " in his wicked and euer-working vices: " be still thy selfe then, and truly Noble " as thou art. It may be for his place thou " owest him respect; but what? therewith " the losse of honour? thine affection, but " not thy bed; thy loue, but not thy be- " loued, yet hast thou lost at once all " these, and be thy onely bereauer: thou " wast my stay whilest I stayed by thee; " and now being down, reuenge my fall: " the instinct of Nature doth pittie our " weakenesse; the law of Nations doth " maintaine our honour; and the Sword " of Knighthood is sworne by, to be vn- " sheathed for our iust defence; much " more the linck of wedlocke claimes it, " which hath lockt two hearts in one; " but alas, that ward is broken, and I am " thy shame, who might haue been thine " honour. Reuenge thy selfe therefore " both on him and mee, else shall this " hand let out the Ghost that shall still " attend thee with acclamations, til thou " reuenge my stained bloud.

(5) Beorn vnwonted thus to be well-commed, much amazed at his wiues maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who reuealed (as well as shame, teares, and sobs, would suffer) the manner of the deed, still vrging reuenge for the wrong. Beorn touched thus to the quicke (to pacifie his distressed wife) did not a little dissemble his wrath, & excusing the fact with the power of a Prince, that might command, and her owne weakenesse, vnable to resist the strength of a man, commended much her loue and constancy; and alledging his wrongs to be equall with hers (if not greater) in regard of their sexe, willed her to set her string to his tune, till fit opportunity would serue to strike: But shee distasting that sweete consort, wrested her passion into so high a straine, that nothing could be heard but reuenge and bloud.

(6) Beorn thus instigated by the continuall cryes of his Wife, whose rape already of it selfe had giuen sufficient cause of wrath; first consulting with his neerest friends, was offered their assistance against that wicked & libidinous Prince, and then repayring to his Court, in presence of them all, made knowne his vnsufferable wrongs, and with vtter defiance departed, threatning his death.

This Noble-man in his youth had bin brought vp in Denmarke, and is reported to haue beene allianced into the Danish royall bloud: Hee therefore accounted this Nation the surest vnto himselfe, and the fittest in will and power to enter his quarrell. So comming to Goderick King of that Country, made his case knowne, instantly desiring his ayde against the villany of Osbright.

Godericke glad to haue some quarrell to enter Britaine, leuied an Army with all speed, and preparation made for all things necessary, sendeth forth Inguar and Hubba, two brethren, to command in chiefe, ouer an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fittest for the attempt, not oncly for their wel-approued reſolution and valour, but alſo for that hee knew them to be, on particular motiues (which vſually more affect then doth a common cauſe) implacably enraged againſt the Engliſh, on an occaſion vnfortunately hapning, but moſt lamentably purſued; which it will not be amis here to annexe.

Flores Hiſtoriarum. *That is, Leatherbriche.

(7) A certaine Daniſh Nobleman of the Royall lineage, named * Lothbroke, Father to this Inguar and Hubba, being vpon the ſhore, his Hawke in flying the game, fell into the Sea, which to recouer, he entred a little Schiffe or Cockboat, nothing fore-ſeeing the danger that immediately did enſue: for a ſodaine tempeſt ariſing, carried the boat into the deepe, and droue him vpon the coaſt of Norfolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Rodham, and no ſooner was ſeene, but was taken for a Spye; and preſently ſent to Edmund, King then of that Prouince: But in his anſweres hee ſufficiently cleared that ſuſpition, and alſo declaring his Birth and misfortune, was honourably entertained in the Court of that Eaſt-Angles King, whom Edmund much eſteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexteritie and expertneſſe in Hawking, held him in a ſpeciall regard; inſomuch, that his Falconer, named Bericke, conceiued ſuch ſecret enuy and deadly hatred thereat, as hauing him alone in a wood, he cowardly murthered him, and hid his dead body in a Buſh.

Murther will out.

(8) Lothbroke, in the Kings preſence and Court, was ſoone miſt, and diligent inquiſition made, could not be found; vntill his Spaniell, which would not forſake his dead Maſters corps, came fawningly vnto the King, as ſeeming to beg reuenge on ſo bloudy an act; which hee did more then once, and at length being obſerued, and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Bericke conuicted for the murther; his iudgement was to be put into Lothbrokes boat, and that without either tackle or Oare, as he therein arriued, and ſo left to the Seas mercy to be ſaued by deſtiny, or ſwallowed vp by iuſt deſert.

But behold the euent; the boat returned to the ſame place, and vpon the ſame coaſt arriued, from whence it had beene driuen, euen in Denmarke, where Bericke being knowne, and hands laid on him, to free himſelfe from the puniſhment of his butcherly fact, hee added Treaſon to Murther, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In reuenge whereof, and likewiſe in Godericks quarrell, Inguar and Hubba, ſonnes to the murthered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes; firſt arriuing at Holderneſſe, burnt vp the Countrey, and without mercy maſſacred all before them, ſparing neither ſexe, nor calling, nor age; and ſurprizing Yorke, which Osbright had taken for his refuge, there ſlew that luſtfull Prince, with all his forces, and poſſeſſed that Citie; and afterwards burſting into Norfolke, ſent this meſſage vnto King Edmund: That Inguar, the moſt victorious Prince, dread both by ſea and land, hauing ſubdued diuers Countries vnto his ſubiection, and now arriued in thoſe parts, where he meant to winter, charged Edmund to diuide with him his riches, and to become his vaſſale and ſeruant.

The King aſtonied at this ſtrange and vnexpected Ambaſſage, conſulted with his Counſell, where one of his Biſhops (then his Secretary, & a principall man) vſed perſwaſions to him to yeeld, for preuenting greater miſchiefe; who notwithſtanding, returned this Anſwere: Goe tell thy Lord, that Edmund the Chriſtian King, for the loue of this temporall life, will not ſubiect himſelfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke.

Whereupon Inguar and Hubba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, purſued the King to Thetford, and (as Fabian ſaith) to Framingham, others to Halesdon; where hee pittying the terrible ſlaughter of his people, yeelded himſelfe to their perſecutions; and for that hee would not deny CHRIST, and his Chriſtian Faith, was bound to a Tree or Stake, and with their arrowes ſo ſhot to death: whoſe body was afterward there buried, and thereupon tooke the name of S. Edmunds-bury, as wee haue formerly touched in his Raigne, Lib. 7. Cap. 11.

(10) Whether theſe were the very true cauſes, or ſome other, which drew theſe Danes hither, moſt certaine it is, and too lamentable experience ſhewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) about the yeare of Chriſt eight hundred, and in the dayes of King Brightrick. Neither want there Authors who aſcribe certaine predictions to haue forerunne the yeare 800. made vnfortunate by their firſt attempts, foreſhewed ſeauen yeares before, by ſhowers of bloud falling from heauen, and bloudy Croſſes markt therewith vpon the garments of men, men, reported by the learned Alcuinus, who was instructor to Charles the Great, and borne in the County of Yorke, where this wonder happened: which himselfe saw and testified vnto Ethelbert King of that Prouince, as Malmesbury hath written, and was thought by Houeden, Higden, Fabian, and others, to haue beene sent for signes before their bloudy assaults, which beganne at the day-spring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promised a most faire ascent to their heires succeeding, but mounted to the highest, againe declined as the setting-Sunne, and fell vnder the clouds of their owne ruines, so carried by the just reuenging hand of God: For those Saxons hauing by bloud and warre vnseated the Britaines of their land and right, by bloud and warre, were by these Pagan Danes so vncessantly molested, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any state sure, long to hold that which they enioyed, nor their liues secured from a daily expectation of their sauage swords.

(11) Whose many Inuasions and cruell proceedings against this Land & Nation, are already shewed in the Raignes of these Saxon Kings, who then felt their heauy strokes in warre, hauing nothing almost memorable otherwise, to enlarge their fames & stories with, besides these their valours in resisting so mightie and almost vnrepugnable an enemie. Therefore omitting to repeat such things as in their successions are handled, wee will fall neerer the time of the wished haruest of their full Conquests; somewhat remembring the Reader here, of those bloudy affaires, which the English at seuerall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murther of holy Edmund, King of the East-Angles, with Danish arrowes martyred to death as he stood bound vnto a stake, euer calling on the name of IESVS: Of Ella and Osbright Gouernours of Northumberland by them slaine, and that Prouince for a long time after by them enioyed, and made subiect to their furies: Of Burdred King of Mercia, by them expulsed, who with his QVEENE Ethelswith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leauing it to the possession of these Pagan intruders, and to seeke their securities in forraine Countries, where at Rome in Italy he dyed, and at Padua his Wife, as hath beene said: Of Ethelred King of the west-Saxons, that in one yeares continuance fought nine bloudy battles against them, in the last whereof at Merton, he receiued his deaths-wound, and this Kingdome an vncureable blow: Of Elfred that most famous and learned King of the West-Saxons also, driuen by them to such distresse, that he was forced to leaue his Princely Court, and to remaine secret in a poore Cow-heards house vnknowne and disguised, in the Isle of Ethlingsey in the Countie of Sommerset, and thence to aduenture himselfe among the Danish Host, as a base Minstrell and contemptible Make-sport, till he had perfectly learned their secrets, & after with his sword, through the thickest of those Enemies, made a way to his owne most glorious Monarchy.

(13) To speake nothing of the desolations left in euery Prouince, Towne, and Place, where they came, laying all leuell with the ground, as prints of their foote-steppes where they had troden: Their cruell and mercilesse dealings towards holy and religious persons, with the ruination of Churches, and other places for Oratorie, is most lamentable to be rehearsed or remembred: and among many others, the faire & beautifull Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Coldingham, were made subiect to their desolations: In the last whereof, Lady Ebbe with her chaste Nunnes, to auoid their sauage and filthy pollutions, cut off their owne noses and vpper-lips, least the bait of their beauties should proue the bane of their honours and honestie.

Their sturdy behauiour, and Lord-like carriage against the English, in all places where euer they soiourned, was with such subiection of the poore Owners, that they abused both wife, daughter, and maide, and were of all called the Lord-Dane, till lastly they were Lords indeed of the Land, and swayed the Scepter at their owne pleasures, which how it was attained vnto, we haue before declared, and how it was worne and continued, we are now presently to speake.

CANVTVS THE FIRST DANISH KING RAIGNING IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE-FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN; HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER III.

An. D. 1017

THE sayles of the Danes thus ouer-filled with the gales of their swelling fortunes, & themselues arriued at the Port of their long-sought soueraignetie, cast anker as it were at the hauen of their wished desire, and prepared themselues to a setled rest: for Canutus possest of halfe the Kingdome by composition with Edmund, now after his death seazed vpon the whole; and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with justice, and concord, hee called a Counsell of the English Nobilitie at London; wherein was propounded, whether, in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne had beene reserued for King Edmunds brethren or sonnes. The English, that had paid a very deere rate for their ouer-bold resistance before, not daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, absolutely answered, No; and hauing learned to appease Princes with flattery, offered their swords against any such claimes, and tooke themselues the Oath of alleagiance vnto Canutus; who being a very wise and politike Prince, thought neuer the better of them for such their doings; whose truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could neuer (he well knew) stand firme for him or his forraine posteritie.

Feare makes flatterers.

Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 18.

(2) But being thus cleered of all other opposites, hee prepared with great roialty for his Coronation, which was performed formed at London, by the hands of Lyningus surnamed Elstane, Arch-bishop of Canterburie, in the yeare of Christ Iesus 1017. being the second King of Denmarke of that name, the first of England, and the thirtie fourth Monarch of this Land. His first designes for the establishment of the Crowne to himselfe and Danish issue, was a care to preuent others neere vnto the claime, and therefore, taking counsell with Edrike, banished Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardlesse deportment, was commonly called, the King of Churles, son of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithstanding, hee was guilefully recalled, and treacherously murthered by his owne men, whose body they buryed at Tauestocke in Deuon-shire.

Canutus his care and policies to settle his Crowne.

(3) One cloud thus ouer-blowne, two others appeared, farre more dangerous in Canutus sight; namely, Edward and Edmund, the sonnes of the Iron-side, whom albeit their young yeares might haue freed from suspition of conspiracies, and their gentle dispositions from enuying his glory, yet the bright raies of a Diadem so dazled his jealous eye, that euer he saw (to his owne seeming) the reflection thereof shine from their faces: but ashamed (saith Higden) to lay hand on them himselfe, sent them to his halfe brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we haue said. In the doubtfull times betweene Edmund and Canute, when the scale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had sent Edward, and Alfred (her Sons by King Ethelred) vnto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (we see) the Land was emptied of the English bloud Royall, and the Crowne left for the Dane without competition.

(4) Who now seeking to hold fast the Scepter thus grasped, sought the alliance of the Norman Duke by the espousing of his sister, faire Emma; a suite sounding but harshly in the eares of the English, yea and most of all vnto her selfe, as deeming the linke of loue very slender, that might be broken by the same hand, which was the death of her Husband: Notwithstanding, after good deliberation knowing him childlesse of any lawfull successour, vpon Couenants agreed, that the issue of her body by him, should inherite the English Crowne, the suit was granted, hoping also, if that failed betwixt them, to establish her other sonnes by King Ethelred.

Canutus marrieth Queene Emma.

Emma a very prudent Lady.

This prouident respect so pleased the subiects, that it both drew the hearts of the English vnto Canutus, and their loue vnto Emma in a surpassing measure, as the booke penned to her praise, and written in that age, intituled Encomium Emmæ, sufficiently doth shew.

(5) Neither was her louing care limitted onely to her Sonnes, but further exteded towards the Common-wealth, being much pestred then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle, as drones in the hiue, who at her instigations were sent into Denmarke; and least they should through discontents make any stirres either here or there, had a largesse (to buy their contentment) of fourescore and two thousand pounds.

(6) Canutus his next care for the maintenance of his owne safety, and the continuance of his new-got Empire, was the establishment of good Lawes) which if duly executed, are the very sinewes and strongest guards of all States) to be administred and practised both on the English and Dane alike: wherefore calling a Parliament of his Peeres vnto Oxford, there established many wholsome Acts both for the Clergie and Laitie to obserue; some of which were diuulged by the praise-worthy care of a studious Antiquarie, and a few, as touching Religion, as a relish of the rest, we thinke it not amisse to giue the Reader a taste of.

That vpon the Lords Sabbath, publike Faires, Markets, Synods, Conuenticles, Huntings, and all secular actions should not be exercised, vnlesse some weighty and vrgent necessity required it.

That euery Christian should thrice in the yeare addresse himselfe to the receiuing of the blessed Sacrament of the Lords Supper.

That if a Minister of the Altar killed a man, or else committed any notorious crime, he should be depriued both from his order and dignitie.

That the married woman conuicted for adultery, should haue her nose and eares cut off.

That a widdow marrying within the space of twelue moneths after her husbands decease, should lose her joynter.

(8) These and many other were made, whereby sin was much restrained, and and this Realme peaceably and iustly gouerned. As likewise sundry other Countries were by his godly and royall care; as in especiall is recorded of a young Gentleman of the Danish royall bloud, named Odin, whom King Canute brought ouer with him into England, to be here trained vp in learning, where he profited so well, as also by his trauaile through France (whereby he much exercised both his knowledge and experience) that hee attained the surname of SAPIENT, and the Phisolopher, and therefore was called Odin-char, for the deare esteeme wherein all men held him. This man by his preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia, and Sweuland, conuerted great multitudes to the Faith of Christ.

Aimundus.

(9) But in Denmarke things proceeded not so well; for in the absence of Canutus, and yeere of Christs humanity 1019. the Vandals sore annoyed his subiects: Hee therefore, in the third of his raigne, with a great Host of the English, passed ouer the Seas, and bad his enemies battaile, which, as Mathew of Westminster writeth, went sore against him the first day; and preparing againe for the next, Earle Goodwine, who was Generall of the English, attempted a great enterprize: for in the dead of the night, hee with his souldiers set vpon the Campe of the Vandals, and with a great slaughter of their souldiers, made the two Princes Vlfus and Anlaue to flie the field.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterprise, had notice in the morning that the English were fled, for that their station was left, and not a man found: wherefore following the tract, euen to the enemies Campe, by streames of bloud, and dead bodies of the Vandals; he saw the great ouerthrow that the English had giuen them, for which he euer after held them in great estimation.

Will. Malmesb. Mat. Westminst.

(11) William of Malmesbury and Mathew of Westminster record, that in the yeare 1032. hee vndertooke an expedition into Scotland, with prosperous successe against Malcolme the King thereof, with two other Princes called Melbeath and Ieohmare. But being at length ouer-burdened as it were with his owne greatnesse, and surfeited with glory, which sometimes he had so greedily desired (as euen the greatest earthly delights haue their fulnesse) hee resolued on a more placable course of life, and to affect a higher and heauenly glory, which hath neuer satietie or end. And therefore his deuotiō being great vnto God-ward, on a zealous intent, (such as S. Paul commended in the deuout Israelites) hee tooke a iourney to Rome, to visite the Sepulchers of S. Peter and Paul, in the fifteenth yeare of his raigne; and thence sent his letters to his English Bishops and Nobilitie, beginning thus.

Rom. 10.2.

(12) Canute King of all England, Denmarke, Norway, and Sweyden, to Ailnothus Metropolitan, &c. Wherein hauing first set downe the reason of his pilgrimage to Rome, which was especially to honour S. Peter, as hee had beene taught by Wisemen, that S. Peter had receiued from Christ the great power of binding and loosing, and was also the Key bearer of heauen-gates, for which cause (lest S. Peter should not open the same vnto him when he should come thither) he held it most behoueful for him to procure his Patronage more then all ŷ rest of Saints; then making relation of his honourable entertainment with the Emperor, Pope, and other forraine Princes, sheweth what complaint he had made against the excessiue exactions and huge summes of money extorted by the Pope from the English Arch-Bishops, at such time as they receiued their Palles from Rome; for redresse whereof, and of other abuses, the Pope in a solemne assembly of foure Arch-Bishops, twenty Bishops, and an innumerable multitude of Princes and Nobles obliged himselfe: And thence proceedeth in vowing the whole remainder of his life and raigne, to the onely seruice of God, and due administration of Iustice to his people; to which end, hee first giues command to his Counsellors, that thence-forward they dare not, for whatsoeuer respect, to giue way or cōniuence to any the lest iniustice in his Kingdome; and next to his Officers of Iustice, that as they tender his royall fauour and their own liues, they swerue not from Equity in execution of their places, in respect of any man whosoeuer, no not, for the enriching of the Kings own Coffers, because (saith he) I hold it not needfull, that treasure treasure should be heaped together for mee, by any vniust exactions: and so concludeth with a strict charge to all his Bishops and Iustices, vpon their allegiance both to God and himselfe, to take order in his absence, that Gods Church, and his Ministers, be not defrauded of their Tithes and rights, whereof he vowes at his returne to take a most seuere account.

Touching Gods Church.

(13) By this his great care of his own saluation, and his peoples tranquillitie, we may see the zeale of those dark daies, to haue beene accompanied with the workes of true pietie; whose carnall applications of the spirituall texts, may well condemne these cleerer times, and dayes of more brightnesse, wherein we know, that this Key-keeper of heauen, is no other but the very Christ, who hath the Key of Dauid, which openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth. And that this Kings zeale might be further seene, by his magnificke workes, he beganne to manifest it euen at Rome, where giuing many large gifts vnto Saint Peters Church, he also made free the Saxons Schoole from all tributes.

(14) In Essex he built the Church of Ashdon, where he had the victory against King Edmund. In Norfolke the Abbey of S. Benets, which Saint he greatly reuerenced; and in Suffolke, with an especiall deuotion, built and endowed the Monastery of S. Edmund, which Saint hee most deadly feared: for it is reported, that the seeming ghost of Edmund often affrighted him; for which cause, as also to expiate the sinnes of his Father, who had done great dammage to his possession, hee inuerged the same with a deepe ditch, and offered vp his Crown vpon the Martyrs Tombe. Most rich and royall Iewels hee gaue the Church of Winchester, whereof one is recorded to be a Crosse, worth as much as the whole reuenue of England amounted to in one yeare: vnto Couentry he gaue the Arme of S. Augustine the great Doctor; which hee bought at Papia in his returne from Rome, and for which he paid an hundred talents of siluer, and one of gold.

Canutus his flatterers.

(15) The magnificent greatnesse of this glorious King, so ouer-flowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Cæsar, and to be possessed with power more then humane: To conuict these his fawning ouer-prizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (saith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the Sea began to flow, and then in the presence of his many attendants; spake thus to that Ele- "ment. Thou art part of my dominion, "and the ground whereon I sit is mine, "neither was there euer any that durst "disobey my command, or breaking it, "escaped vnpunished; I charge thee ther- "fore presume not into my land, neither "wet thou these robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth onely one Lord) giuing no heed to his threats, kept on the vsuall course of tyde, first wetting his skirts, and after his thighes; when suddainely rising to giue way for the still-approaching waues, hee thus spake in the hearing of all: Let the worlds Inhabitants know, that vaine and weake is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee that keepes both heauen, earth, and sea in obedience, and bindeth them in the euerlasting law of subiectiō. After which time he would neuer suffer the Crowne to be set vpon his head, but presently crowned therewith the picture of our Sauiour on the Crosse at Winchester: vnto such strong illusions were those godly Princes led, by the guides that euer made gaine of their deuotions.

His humilitie.

(16) From the Example of this Canutus (saith Peter Pictauiensis Chancellour of Paris) arose the custome to hang vp the Armor of worthy men in Churches, as offerings consecrated vnto Him in whose battailes they had purchased renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countries seruice attained to an honourable death. And surely, howsoeuer this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine-glory, for which some haue not stucke to say, that he made his iourney to Rome, rather to shew his pompe and riches, then for any humble deuotion or religious intent, yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of pietie enacted, he may iustly be cleared of that imputation; as also by the testimony of Simon Monke of Durham, who reporteth his humilitie to be such, that with his owne hands he did helpe to remoue the body of S. Aelphegus at the translation of it from London vnto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithstanding his Archiepiscopall and sacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the testimony of Guido, Polydore, Lanquet, and others, he was a Prince of such temperance and iustice, that no other in this West

Saxo Grammaticus. Alb. Krantius. (17) Saxo Grammaticus, and Albertus Krantius, the Writers of the Daniſh Hiſtories, deduce Canutus by a lineall ſucceſſion through the line of their Kings in this manner: He was (ſay they) the ſonne of King Swaine, (ſurnamed Tingſkeg) by Sigred his wife, the widow of Erick, by whom ſhe had Olafe Scotconning King of Sweyden: vnto which Swaine ſhee bare alſo Oſtrid a daughter, the mother of Thira, the mother of King Swain the yonger. Aimundus Bremenſis. The elder Swaine was the ſonne of King Harold, ſurnamed Blaatand, by Gonhild his Queene, who bare him alſo Iring King of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harold was king Gormond, whoſe Queene was Thira the daughter of King Ethelred, the twentie third Monarch of England, who bare vnto him the ſaid Harold, and another Canute, both moſt valiant Princes; which two Gallants inuading this Land, were (for their braue reſolutions) by their Grand-father proclaimed heires apparant to all his dominions: the credit of which Relations I leaue to my forenamed Authors; but Canute (the elder brother) died very ſoone after, being deadly wounded in the ſiege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiuing death at hand, he gaue ſtrict charge to his attendants, to keepe the ſame very ſecret till the Citie were taken, that ſo neither his owne Army ſhould be daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the loſſe of the Generall. Gurmo, his aged Father, (to digreſſe but in a word) ſo incredibly loued him, that he had vowed to kill with his owne hands any perſon whoſoeuer ẏ ſhould tell him the newes of his ſonnes death: which whẽ Thira his mother now heard of, ſhe vſed this policy to make it known to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning apparrell for him, and all other things fitting for funeral exequies, laying aſide all Regall Robes, and ceremonies of princely ſtate, without intimating any cauſe of this ſad ſolemnity; which the old King no ſooner perceiued, but he lamentably cried out, woe is me, I know my ſonne is dead; and with exceſſiue griefe he preſently dyed. But to returne from that Canutus, to cloſe vp the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

Holinſh. Inuaſion of Ireland.

(18) In whom the Daniſh glories hauing aſcended to the higheſt, began now againe to decline towards their wane by the death of this great King; who, after he had in great glory raigned aboue nineteene yeares, deceaſed at Shaftesbury in the County of Dorſet, the twelfth of November, the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation, 1035. and was buried in the Church of the old Monaſtery at Wincheſter, which being after new built, his bones with many other Engliſh-Saxon Kings were taken vp, and are preſerued in guilt coffers fixed vpon the wals of the Quire in that Cathedrall Church.

His Wiues.

Alb. Krantius. (19) Alfgiue, by moſt writers, a concubine to King Canutus, was the daughter of a Mercian Duke named Elfhelme, who is ſaid to haue beene Earle of Northampton; and her Mothers name was Vlfrune, Inheritrix of the Towne Hampton in Stafford-ſhire, from her called Vlfrun-Hampton, now Woller-hampton: This Lady Alfgiue to make Canutus more firme to her loue, her ſelfe being barren, is reported to haue fained Child-birth, and to haue laid in her bed the ſonne of a Prieſt, whom Canute tooke to be his owne, and named him Swaine; him afterwards he created King of Norway, which lately he had conquered from Olaffe called the Martyr. The like policy, ſaith Higden and others, ſhe vſed in bringing forth Harold her ſecond ſonne, who was (ſay they) the ſonne of a Sowter; notwithſtanding, I thinke the condition of the Mother, who liued in diſdaine, and died in diſgrace; rather cauſed this report to be blazed, then any ſuch baſeneſſe of birth in the ſonnes.

(20) Emma, the ſecond wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the Vnready; and from the time of her firſt marriage was called in England, Elfgiue, after the name of moſt of the former Queenes, which had ſucceeded Saint Elfgiue. Shee was married vnto him in the moneth of Iuly, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus one thouſand and ſeuenteene, being the firſt yeare of his raigne: whoſe wife ſhe was eighteene yeares, and ſuruiuing, kept ſtill at Wincheſter, vnto which Church ſhee gaue nine Manours, according to the number of thoſe firy Plowſhares that ſhee was forced to goe vpon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her ſonne, as ſhall be ſaid. This Church ſhee adorned with many goodly veſtures, and very rich Iewels: and deceaſing in this City the ſixt of March, the

His Iſſue.

Alb. Krantius.

(21) Sweyn, the eldeſt ſonne of Canute by Lady Alfgiue, was borne before his Father was King of England, and before his Fathers death, was conſtituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olaffe the Martyr; where he beganne his Raigne, in the yeare of mans ſaluation one thouſand thirtie and fiue, being the eighteenth of his Fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with diſlikes ruled that Realme, the ſpace of fiue yeares, hee was reiected of the Norwegians his ſubiects, and deceaſing without heire of his body, left the Kingdome to the natiue heire, Magnus, the ſonne of Olaffe, who had beene wrongfully diſpoſſeſſed by Canute.

(22) Harold, the ſecond ſonne of King Canute and of Lady Alfgiue, was alſo borne before his Father obtained the Engliſh Crown, and for his exceeding ſwiftneſſe was ſurnamed Hare-foote: He remained with his Father in England, after he had diſpoſed of Denmarke to Hardicanute, and Norway to Sweyne, his brethren, expecting ſomething in reuerſion. But perceiuing at his Fathers death, that England was alſo appointed to his brother Hardi-canute, hee tooke the aduantage of his abſence, and aſſumed the Soueraigntie of this Kingdome to himſelfe.

(23) Hardi-canute, the third ſonne of King Canute, and his firſt by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers Raigne, and towards the end of the ſame, was conſtituted King of the Danes, and deſigned to ſucceede him after his death in his Kingdome of England. But being abſent then in Denmarke, was diſappointed by his brother Harold, who ſucceeded his Father, after whoſe death he alſo ſucceeded him.

(24) Gunhilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the firſt wife of Henry the third Romane Emperour, ſonne of the Emperour Conrad, the ſecond of that name, ſurnamed Salike: Shee was a Lady of a ſurpaſſing beauty, which either mooued her huſbands minde vnto iealouſie, or the ouerlauiſh report thereof to breede ſurmize of incontinencie; for accuſed ſhe was of adulterie, and to defend her cauſe by Combat, none could be found, till laſtly her Page, brought with her from England, ſeeing no other would aduenture for her innocencie, entred the liſt, himſelfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant being a Giant-like man; yet in fight at one blow, cutting the ſinewes of his enemies legge, with another hee feld him to the ground, where preſently with his ſword, hee tooke his head from the ſhoulders, and redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard vſage, the Empreſſe Gunhilda forſooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could be brought againe vnto the ſame, but tooke the holy vaile of a Nunne in the Towne of Burges in Flanders; where ſhee ſpent the reſt of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of S. Donation, being the principall of that Town, where her Monument remaineth beſides the North-dore of the ſame Church vnto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like ſanctitie is reported to be the daughter of King Canute, and the ſecond wife of Godeſcalke, Prince of the Vandals, by whom he had Henry King of that Nation. They both are ſaid to haue ſuffered Martyrdome for the faith of Chriſt; he firſt at the City of Lenzim, and ſhe after at Michelenburg, being moſt cruelly tortured to death with whips. This Lady vpon ſundry ſtrong inducements cannot be reputed legitimate, which moued Andrew Velley a Daniſh Writer in our time, to be therein of a diuers opinion from Adam of Breme, and Helmoldus, who liued fiue hundred yeares before him.

Matth. West.

Will. Malmesb.

Peter de Ichan.

Henry Hunt.

CANVTVS being dead, and Hardi-canute his sonne by Queene Emma, then in Denmarke; Harold his elder (but base-brother) foreslowed not the opportunitie offered; for seeing himselfe in his Fathers life time neglected, and by Will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped vpon Hardi-canute: as quick in apprehension, as he was of foot-manship (whereof arose the surname Hare-foot,) made strong his side by the Londoners, and Danes, Mercians and Northumbrians very many, yea and some great Personages amongst them, affecting his claime: but Goodwin of Kent who had the Queene and her treasure in keeping, stood in his way, pretending himselfe Guardian of her Children, and the Will of Canutus, who appointed his sonne by her to succeede.

(2) The opposition grew strong, and the factions ripened, euen ready to seed, onely the lingering of Hardi-cannte gaue leaue vnto Harold to better his side by daily supplies, and the feares of ciuill sedition mooued the Nobilitie to argue with words and not weapons, the title depending betwixt these two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the presence of the one, downe-peized the absence of the other, so that their voices went onely with Harold, and presently proclaimed and consecrated him King.

(3) He beganne his raigne the yeare of Christs humanity, 1036. and was very solemnly crowned at Oxford by Elnothus Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, though for a time, he was very vnwilling to performe that seruice; for it is reported, that hee hauing the regall Scepter and Crowne in his custody, with an oath refused to consecrate any other for King, so long as the Queenes children were liuing; For (said he) Canutus committed them to my trust and assurance, and to them will I giue my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I here lay downe vpon this Altar; neither doe I denie, nor deliuer them to you; but I require by the Apostolike authority, all Bishops, that none of them presume to take the same away, neither therewith that they consecrate you for King: as for your selfe if you dare, you may vsurpe that which I haue committed to God on this his Table.

Notwithstanding that great thunder-clappe was allayed with the showers of golden promises, of his iust and religious Gouernment intended, though present experience manifested the contrary.

that he ſought meanes how to rid Queene Emma out of the way, and that ſecretly, for openly he durſt not attempt any thing againſt her: Shee in ſilence kept her ſelfe quiet, looking for the iſſue of his deſignes. But Harold malicionſly purpoſing, tooke counſel how he might traine into his Haye the ſonnes of Queene Emma, that ſo all occaſion of dangers againſt him might at once for all be cut off: many proiects propounded, this laſtly tooke effect; that a letter ſhould be counterfeited in Queene Emma's name, vnto her ſonnes Edward and Alfred, to inſtigate them to attempt the Crowne vſurped by Harold, againſt their right, the tenure whereof we haue thought good here to inſert.

" (5) Emma, Queene onely in name,

" ſith you know, that the delay of at" tempts giue the vſurper more leaſure
" to lay his foundation, and more ſafely
" to ſet thereon his intended buildings;
" for inceſſantly he poſteth from Towne
" to Towne, and from City to City, to " make the Lords & Rulers thereof his,

" not therefore to ſend word by this my
" meſſenger, how you mean to proceed:
" and ſo fare ye well, my deareſt bowels,
" and very inwards of my heart.

(6) Theſe Letters thus carried and cunningly deliuered, were digeſted as ſauouring of no falſhood; and by the bringers, others returned, that Alfred ſhould come ſhortly ouer to attend his mothers deſignes: theſe newes brought vnto Harold, the coaſts were fore-laid, and longing expectation attended the prey. Alfred as forward to ſet on his voyage, made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and ſome few Bullogners increaſing his Fleet, he tooke the Seas for England: where comming to ſhore, Earle Goodwin met him, and binding his aſſurance with his corporall oath, became his liege-man, and guide to Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Harold, trecherouſly led theſe ſtrangers a contrary way, and at Guilford lodged them in ſeuerall companies, making knowne to the King what he had done: who forthwith apprehended them, euen in their beds, and in the morning as chained priſoners, committing them to ſlaughter, (contrary to the wonted manner of military decimation) did ſpare and exempt onely euery tenth man for ſeruice or ſale: Prince Alfred himſelfe was ſent priſoner to the Iſle of Ely, where hauing his eyes inhumanely put out, liued not long after in torment and griefe.

Encom. Emma.

(7) Some adde vnto the former, another, much more horrible kinde of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawne out, and faſtned to a ſtake, his body pricked with ſharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till all his entrails were extracted, in which moſt ſauage torture hee ended his innocent life.

Will. Coxton.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee thought would no further attempt; and therefore the more boldly ſet himſelfe againſt their mother Queene Emma, whoſe goods he confiſcated, and baniſhed her out of the Realme: who thus diſtreſſed, was honorably receiued, and for three yeares ſpace maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders.

Henry Hunt.

(9) The Dane then ſeeing his hazards thus preuented, ſought ſo to ſecure himſelfe, and with ſixteene ſhippes of the Daniſh Fleet kept the Seas, which continued euer in a readineſſe, & watted from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, he charged the Engliſh with great paiments, to their no little grudge and repining; whereby he loſt the loue of his ſubiects before it had well taken root in their hearts.

(10) Neither yet held he on long in theſe diſroyall courſes, for that his ſpeedy death did cut off the infamy of a longer life; and is ſaid to haue dyed at Oxford in the moneth of Aprill, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1040. after he had raigned foure yeares and ſome moneths: whoſe body was at firſt interred at Weſtminſter, hauing beene neither in warres ſo hardy, nor in gouernment ſo proſperous, as his Father Canute before him had beene, nor left behinde him either wife or children, to ſuruiue his perſon, or reuiue his name.

HARDI-CANVTE THE THIRD DANISH KING THAT RAIGNED IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE-SIXT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN; HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarc. 36.

CHAPTER V.

An. D. 1040

Simon Dun.

Ma. Weſtminſt.

THE States of the Land, as well Engliſh as Danes, that had ſtood for Harold, both in obtaining & keeping the Crown, now ſeeing him fallen, thought it beſt to make way for their peace, before Hardicanute by his ſword ſhould purchaſe their ſubiection; therefore with all haſt they ſent into Denmark, with proffers of the Scepter, and their forward allegiance onely vnto him. Thoſe parts beyond Seas, were not then ſo ſubiectiue, as to build his hopes there, vpō any ſure grounds; for the Norwegians had thruſt out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the ſonne of Olaffe for their King; ſo that ſmall aſſurance could hee perceiue of any quiet Common-weale among them: and therefore foreſlowing not the offer, immediately imbarked his men of warre, and with ſo fauourable a winde tooke Seas, that he arriued vpon the Coaſt of Kent, the ſixt day after he had ſet ſayle out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conueyed to London, was there proclaimed Englands King.

(2) Hee beganne his Raigne in the yeare of Graee one thouſand and fortie, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, being the thirtie ſixt Monarch of the Engliſh-men: his raigne was ſpent in doing nothing, vnleſſe you will ſay, in doing euill he did ſomething.

(3) For no ſooner had he a power to command, but he forthwith commanded the the body of his halfe-brother the deceaſed King, to be digged vp, and with ſpitefull diſgrace to be throwne into Thamiſis, where it remained vntill a Fiſherman found it, & buried it in the Church-yard of S. Clement without Temple-Barre, commonly called Saint Clement-Danes, for that (ſaith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes: this cruelty ſhewed, was pretended for the hard vſage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly ſpiced with reuenge for his vſurpation of the Crowne againſt him.

John Stow in his Surucy of London.

(4) Yet worthily is he to be commended, for the reuerent regard he bare to his Mother, and louing affection to his Brother; for no ſooner was he riſen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that he ſent honorable Embaſſage vnto Earle Baldwine, with many thankes to him, for her princely vſage, and for her to returne into England to her former eſtate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward cõming ouer to viſit them both, was moſt honorably receiued, retained, and diſmiſſed; and theſe are the vertues regardable in this King.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more perſons, for a great Epicure he was, and giuen much vnto Cuppes, whereby hee trained the body to bellycheare, and ſenſe to be ſubiect to ſloath and drunkenneſſe; foure times euery day were his Tables ſpred, and plenteouſly with all Cates furniſhed, euer commanding that his Courtiers, gueſts, and ſeruants, ſhould rather leaue, for ſuperfluitie, then call, for lacke: which howſoeuer it was in him accounted for Royall bounty, yet it cauſed in the people (who vſe to prayſe the Soueraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous looſenes, and the Common-weale to lye ſicke of conſumptions bred by ſuch exceſſe of thoſe groſſe humours in her body.

(6) This wrought in him a careleſſe neglect of gouernment in State, ſo that the whole managing thereof was committed to his Mother Queene Emma, a woman extreamely couetous, and to Goodwin, the rich and politicke Earle of Kent; who ſeeing the preſent ſtate carried wholly away with preſent pleaſures, thought that a fit ſubiect for him to worke vpon; for the King not married (vnles it were to his lewd will) & Edward likely to ſucceede, of an ouer-ſoft temperature; he thought theſe both might prooue aduantageous to his ambition, and therefore be-thought him, how the Crowne might be worne by him or his.

(7) Therefore, to ſeparate the hearts of the ſubiects from the Prince (then which, there can be no greater a wound vnto both) he cauſed the King to impoſe heauy tributes vpon the Engliſh, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleet, appointing euery common Souldier and Mariner, to receiue eight markes in money, and euery Officer and Maſter twelue; which amounted to the ſumme of thirty two thouſand, one hundred forty-ſeauen pounds: for the payment whereof, there was ſo great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurſtane and Feader were ſlaine by the Citizens of Worceſter; which cauſed their City to be burnt, and part of the country ſpoyled by the Kings command, and their Biſhop Alfred expulſed the See, till with money he had purchaſed his peace. This Biſhops hands (as was ſaid) were deepe in the murther of Prince Alfred, the Kings halfe-brother, whom we ſpake of; yea, and Goodwin himſelfe was put to his purgatiõ by oath, for the clearing of his ſuſpitions in that treacherous and brutiſh fact: which oath was the lighter vrged, and the eaſier receiued for his rich and bounteous gifts, immediatly before preſented to the King, and that was a Shippe, whoſe ſterne was of gold, with foureſcore Souldiers therein placed, all vniformely and richly ſuited: On their heads they all wore guilt Burgenets, and on their bodies a triple guilt Habergion, a Sword with guilt hilts girded to their waſtes, a Battaile-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left ſhoulders, a Target with guilt boſſes borne in their left hands, a Dart in the right, their armes bound about with two braceletes of gold containing ſixteene ounces in weight.

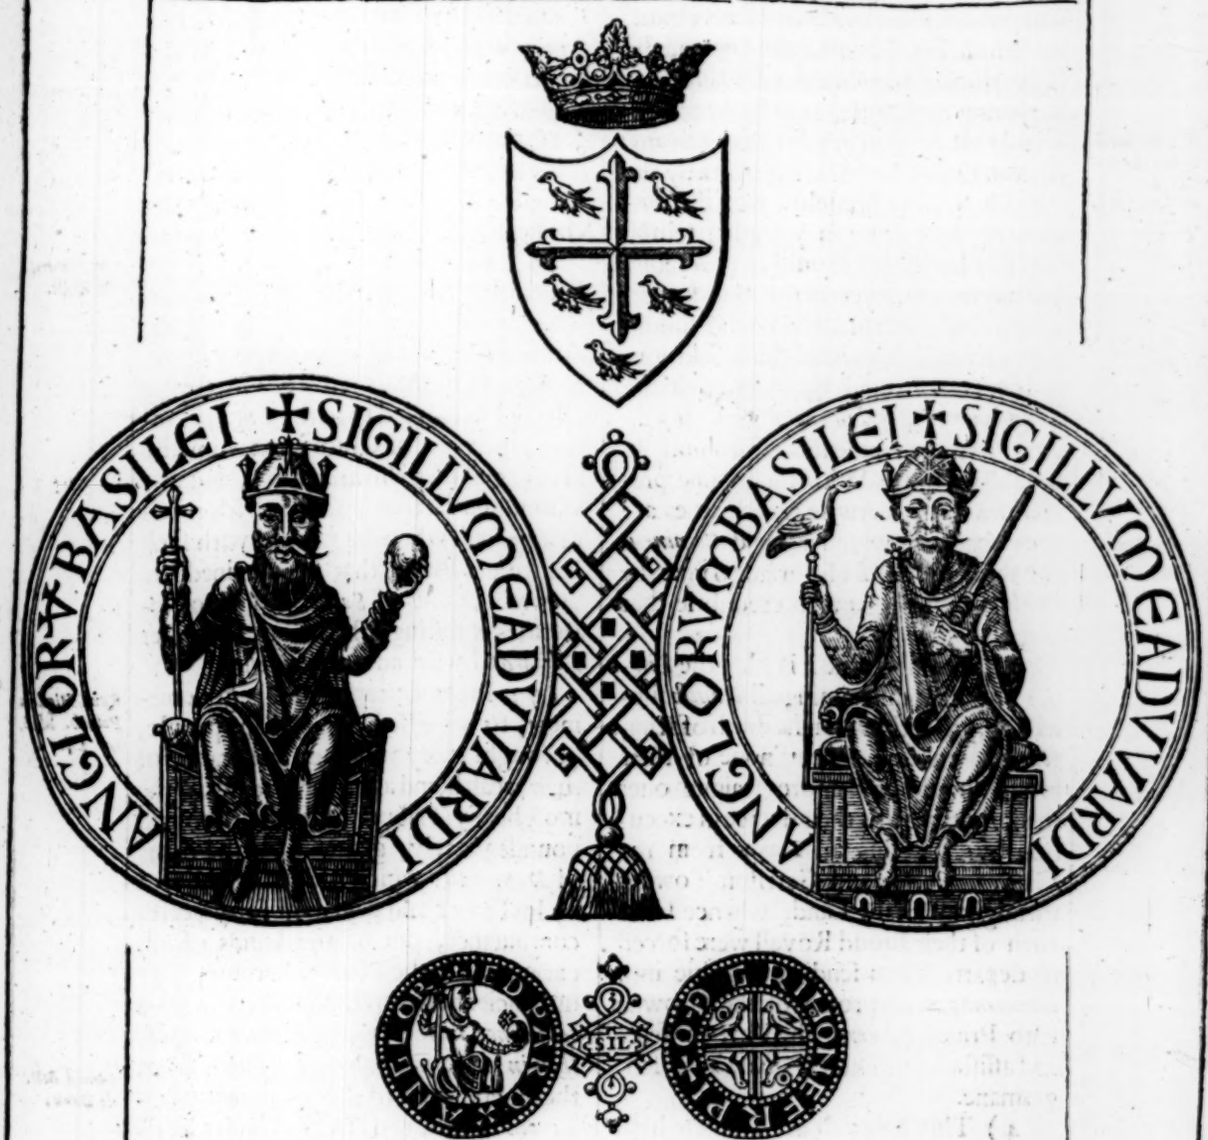
EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, SONNE OF KING ETHELRED, THE THIRTIE-SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN; HIS RAIGNE, VERTVES, AND MARRIAGE.



CHAPTER VI.

An. D. 1042 Henry Hunt.

EDward, the Third of that name before the cõquest, halfe-brother to the deceased Hardi-Canute, and sonne to King Ethelred by Queen Emma his Wife, was by the prouident care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable successe of Warre, doubtfully depended betwixt Edmund the English, and Canutus the Dane) sent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to be secured from all domesticall stirres: and now, before the dead corps could be interred, with a generall consent of the Nobles was elected their King.

Legend. Aur. in vit. S. Edwardi.

(2) I know well that in the legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with safetie of truth may be either beleeued, or deliuered; as that he was chosen King by consent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the same time hauing many other sonnes aliue; as also when the destroying Danes had extinguished by their warres almost the whole Royall issue of the English, the holy Monke Brightnold, of Glastenbury deploring their losse, and the Lands miserable estate, had in vision this Edward, then an Exile, presented vnto him by the Apostle S. Peter himselfe, who then annointing him King in his sight, telling him that his Raigne should be peaceable, and twenty three yeeres for continuance; Brightwold yet vnsatisfied who should next succeed, demanded the resolution, and was answered by Peter, that the Kingdome of England was Gods owne Knigdome; for whose successors himselfe would prouide. With such vaine predictions our otherwise true Stories are ouer-charged; which moued Comineus the worthy French Historian, to taxe the English with ouer-much credulitie that way.

(3) But most true it is, that the English Nobility disclaiming all Danish subiection, presently vpon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their bloud should any more Raigne ouer them: putting this their decree in execution by cashiering all Danes from the Castles, Forts, and Garrison Townes throughout all the Land, whence some euen of their Bloud Royall were forced to depart. Then sending securitie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne vnto Prince Edward, had his consent, and assistance of Duke William his cosen-germane.

(4) This Edward (as elsewhere hath beene said) was borne at Islip neere vnto Oxford, & tenderly educated by Queene Emma his Mother; and after his Fathers death, for safety sent into France; where, by his sweet conuersation he gained the loue of all, and as much himselfe affected those strangers, which was some blemish of policie in the face of his gouernment, when he had got the Diadem, as being of disposition ouer-soft, and euer too pliant (an imperfection in a Soueraigne) to take the impresse of any stamp. In which mould, the aspiring Goodwin Earle of Kent, did cast the fabricke of his owne designes; who had made away Alfred, his yonger, but of a more resolute spirit, that so the basis of his owne piller (whose top in time he hoped to crowne) might be set, if not vpon, yet with the neerest to the Throne.

(5) He therefore, the formost both in will and power, vsed both to establish Prince Edward in his right, being seconded by Leofrick Earle of Chester, and Lyuingus Bishop of Worcester, and in deed with the generall assistance of all the English; who now were so iealous of all forraine powers, that they forbad an ouergreat traine of Normans (though comming for his ayde) to attend their new-chosen King.

Alfred Beuerl. Iohn Rouse.

(6) His Coronation was at Winchester, with great concourse of people, and the celebration performed by Edsine, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, vpon the very day of Christ his resurrection, (being also a new-rising day to the English Nation) the yeare of Grace 1042. himselfe being aged then towards forty, and was in number the thirtie seauenth Monarch of England, where he raigned with such Iustice and Piety, that he obtained the venerable name of Saint, and vnto posterities is distinguished from the other Edwards, by the adiunct Confessor.

Rand. Higd. in Polych. lib. 6. cap. 24.

(7) In the entrance of his gouernment, to witnesse his loue to his people, he sought euery way the furtherance of their wealth, and afterwards remitted the most heauy Tribute of fortie thousand pounds yearely, gathered by the name of Dane-gylt, which had beene imposed by his Father, and payed for forty yeeres continuance, out of the Lands of all, except onely the Clergie, because, (say our ancient lawes) the Kings reposed more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armies. Then, from the diuers Lawes of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latine, (that al men of any learning might know whereon to relye) to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the squire by which he would haue euery right to to be measured; being (in a sort) the fountaine of those, which at this day we terme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading and processe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquest.

(8) The raigne of this King, by moſt writers records, was more ſpent in peace and workes of true pietie, then in warres and bloud, though ſome diſſentions happened both domeſticall and forraine: for about the yeare one thouſand fortie fiue, and third of his Raigne, a royall Nauy was rigged in Sandwich-Hauen againſt Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to inuade England, and indeed had ſo done, if the warres of Sweyne, King of Denmarke had not diuerted his purpoſe.

Alb. Krantius.

(9) This Sweyn was the ſonne of Duke Wolfe, by Oſtryd his Ducheſſe, Siſter to Hardi Canute, who as I finde written in the manuſcript of Aimundus Bremenſis, being in poſſeſſion of two Kingdomes, prepared his Nauy for the Conqueſt of England alſo: But, (ſaith he) King Edward gouerning that Kingdome with great Iuſtice and Loue, choſe rather his peace with proffers of Tribute, and promiſes that after his death the Crowne ſhould be his, yea though himſelfe ſhould haue children: howbeit this ſeemeth not to ſound for truth; for Sweyn ſending his Ambaſſadours vnto Edward to craue ayde againſt Magnus (his grieuous and mortall enemy,) could obtaine none; and Harold Harfager, the ſucceſſour of Magnus, and enemy to Sweyn, preſently thereupon ſent vnto Edward for a league of amitie, which was ratified firmely betwixt them.

Aimundus Bremenſis.

(10) Neither may wee thinke that euer he meant his Crowne that way; for that beſides the decree enacted againſt all Daniſh claimes, his deſire to eſtabliſh it in the Engliſh bloud is moſt manifeſt, by ſending for Edward his Nephew, the ſonne of Edmund Iron-ſide, remaining in Hungary, and that ſo long out of England, that hee was called the Out-law; who comming ouer, brought with him his wife Agatha, and children, Edgar a ſonne, and Margaret and Chriſtian his daughters; him Edward meant to haue made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene preuented by haſty death, whereupon the King deſigned young Edgar, his ſonne, the heire apparent, and gaue him the ſurname of Adeling, a name of great honour appropriated to the Princes of the bloud, and men capable of the Crowne.

The Iriſh likewiſe with thirty ſix ſhips entred Seuern, and with the aſſiſtance of Griffith King of South-Wales burnt or ſlew all that they found; againſt whom Alfred Biſhop of Worceſter went and fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, that many of his ſouldiers were ſlaine, & the reſt put to flight; which made the Welſh-men farre more bold, and Reſe the brother of Griffith, make many incurſions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length he was ſlain at Bulenden, and his head preſented to King Edward at Glouceſter.

(12) His domeſticall moleſtations, were chiefly by Earle Goodwin and his ſonnes; and thoſe firſt ſpringing vpon this following occaſion. Euſtace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne, who had married Goda, ſiſter by the fathers ſide to King Edward, came into England to viſite him then lying at Glouceſter, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Harbinger dealing roughly with a Burgeſſe for lodgings, cauſed his own death; which when his Lord heard of, thirſting for reuenge, he ſlew eighteene Citizens in the heat of his furie: The Canterburians in as great a rage got them to armour, and ſlew twentie of his retinue, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoyle; whoſe grieuous complaint comming to the King, he commanded Goodwin to ſee executiõ done vpon the offenders. Earle Goodwin not haſty to follow his commiſſion, aduiſed the King to examine the cauſe before he maſſacred his true ſubiects at the inſtigation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Goodwin thereby gained great loue of the Commons. This occaſioned Robert Gemeticenſis a Norman, firſt made Biſhop of London, and after Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to ſpread the Curtaine of diſfauour betwixt Goodwin and the King, vrging his refuſall as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be ſuffered; whereupon Edward called an aſſembly of Eſtates, appointing a day of meeting at Glouceſter.

(13) The Commons (whoſe common guiſe is, deadly to hate all ſtrangers, though many times well deſeruing) now ſeeing Earle Goodwin in danger for their good, were eaſily drawne to aſſiſt him and his cauſe, and in war-like manner guarded his perſon, at Beuerſtane not farre from the King. The Eſtates aſſembled, and Goodwin ſent for, he refuſed to come, pretending ſeruice againſt the Welſh, Welſh, then ready to make inroades, and that his preſence was more needful there then at Court; albeit the Welſh-men cleared themſelues by ſending their Ambaſſadours vnto the King. The ſuſpitions increaſing, great preparation on both ſides was made; to aſſiſt the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Cheſter, Siward the ſtout Earle of Northumberland, and Rodulfe Earle of Hereford his ſiſter Godus ſonne, by her firſt husband Walter de Maigne.

The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to proue dangerous; the matter both with great foreſight and prouidence was referred vnto Parliament, to be holden at London with all conuenient haſt, whereunto pledges were both giuen and receiued on either parts.

(15) King Edward ſtrongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Goodwin with his ſonnes in warlike manner came into Southwarke to his owne houſe. But his Army wauering, and (as bad cauſes and conſciences make men doe) ſuſpecting the worſt, by little and little ſhrunke away from him; which knowne to the King, he preſently pronounced ſentence of baniſhment vnto Goodwin and his fiue ſonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Goodwin therefore with great riches and his three ſonnes, Swaine, Toſtie, and Girth, ſayled into Flanders, and Harold with his brother Leofwine, from Briſtow paſſed into Ireland; who were no ſooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gaue the Earledome of Harold vnto Algar, the ſonne of Leofricke, Earle of Cheſter. (16) In the ſecond yeare of Goodwins baniſhment, both himſelfe and thoſe his ſonnes with him, hauing gotten ſhippes conuenient for warre, in manner of Pirates came vpon the coaſts of Kent and Suſſex, doing much harme, and returning with ſpoyles: the like did Harold and Leofwin from Scotland, vpon the weſterne coaſts of Sommerſet and Deuonſhires, who thence coaſting about the point of Cornwall, ioyned their Fleete with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

(17) Againſt them King Edward prepared, and himſelfe, though aged, with a Nauy of ſixtie ſhippes well furniſhed for warre, meant to haue made an end of that buſineſſe, by the deſtruction of his aduerſaries: but the Nauies ready to ioyne battell, God tooke the cauſe into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge ſo ouer-ſpread the Seas, that one Fleet could not thereby ſee another; in which, Goodwin and his complices by contrary windes were driuen to the place from whence they came. King Edward ſtill in iealouſie of Goodwins returne, rigged forth forty tall ſhips, to ſecure the Seas, which kept not ſo ſtrong a watch, but that Goodwin got by them, ſolliciting the people of Kent, Suſſex, and Surrey, vnto his aid, and entring Thameſis, did the like vnto them in London, who accepted of his arriuage, though King Edward lay there: ſo that without diſturbance his Nauie fell vp with the tide, through the ſouth Arch of the Bridge, and a mightie army to his aid muſtered vpon the ſame ſide of the Riuer.

(18) The Nobilitie then ſeeing ſide againſt ſide, and all of them meere Engliſh, ready to hazard their bloud in the quarrels of Strangers, wrought ſo with Edward and Goodwin, that they came vnto peace, and pledges were againe deliuered for the performance, whereof Wilmot the ſonne of Earle Goodwin, and Hacun the ſonne of Swaine his eldeſt, were ſent to Duke William of Normandy; ſo great a truſt he euer repoſed in ſtrangers. (19) Goodwin now reſtored, and in great credit with the King, caſt the eye of diſdaine vpon the Arch-biſhop Robert (as commonly Fauourites emulate each others,) and himſelfe being a man eloquent and politicke, ſo poſſeſſed the King both againſt him and his Normans, that he requited his owne baniſhment, with all theirs out of England, ſome few excepted, that were fauoured by the Engliſh: and now promiſing himſelfe much honour and authoritie; was ſodainely cut off by the ſtroake of death, ſurprizing him as he ſate at Table with the King vpon Monday in Eaſter weeke, but dyed not till the Thurſday following, which happened at Wincheſter, where he was buryed.

(20) Beſides theſe former forraine and ciuill moleſtations, other calamities happened to the Land; for in the yeare of Grace 1047. and moneth of Ianuary, there fell ſo great a ſnow, which couered the ground vntill the middle of March, that Cattle and Fowles periſhed abundantly: and on the firſt day of that Moneth the yeare following, a ſtrange and terrible Earth-quake happened, which ſeemed to rend the ground aſunder, and withall ſuch Lightnings, as burnt vp the Corne, growing in the fields, whereby an exceſſiue Dearth followed: ſo that his raigne was neither ſo peaceable nor proſperous, as Brightwold the Monke dreamed it ſhould be. But as all theſe were ſcourges ſent from God vpon the Land for ſinne, ſo both Prince, Paſtors and people, had all ſeuerally their part thereof, as being ioyntly the cauſers of the ſame.

(21) For the King, in caſe of theſe Strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to be loſt: and himſelfe refraining the bed of his vertuous wife, committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apoſtle, and cauſed her his Queene, either to cõmit or to be accuſed to haue committed adultery. The Clergie likewiſe altogether vnlearned, wanton and vicious: for the Prelates neglecting the offices of Epiſcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and to feede the flocke of Chriſt, liued themſelues idle, and couetous, addicted wholly to the pompe of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches & ſoules cõmitted to their charge: and if any told them (ſaith Higden) that their liues ought to be holy, and their conuerſation without Couetouſneſſe, according to the ſacred preſcript, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would ſcoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, aliÿ pro tempore mores; Times haue mutations, So muſt mens faſhions: and thus, (ſaith he,) they plained the roughneſſe of their doings with ſmoothnes of their anſwers. Briefly, the whole people were ſo looſe and riotous, that as Gernaſius Dorobornenſis recordeth, they fell ſo faſt to commit wickedneſſe, as to be ignorant of ſinfull crimes, was then held to be a great crime it ſelfe. And by the teſtimony of Malmesbury, the ſinnes of thoſe times euidently fore-ſhewed a generall deſtruction: for the Engliſhmen (ſaith he) transformed themſelues into the ſtrange manners of the French, and that not onely in ſpeech and behauiour, but in their deedes, and Charters: their vſe was then to goe fantaſtically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid-knee, their heads ſhorne, and their beards ſhauen all but the vpper-lippe, which grew with long muſtaches; continually wearing maſſie bracelets of gold about their armes, carrying markes vpon their skinne pounced in of ſundry colours; and the Clergie contenting themſelues with triuiall literature, could ſcarcely hacke and hew out the words of the Sacrament. Theſe then were Englands dolorous times of blindneſſe and lewdneſſe, drawing downe Gods wrath for their deſtruction.

(23) Indeed Malmesbury doth taxe her to haue beene inſatiably couetous, and that ſhee was more tenderly affectionate to her Daniſh, then Engliſh children, whereby her loue was meaſured to their Fathers. But for the imputation of her incontinencie, ſhe waſhed it off with as ſharpe a triall as any that is recorded for truth, by vndergoing that ouer-hard law Ordalium, when in preſence of the King her Sonne, and many of his Peeres, ſhee paſſed ouer between nine plough-ſhares glowing red hot, bare-footed and blind-folded, without any hurt; vſing this ſpeech to her leaders, as not knowing ſhe was paſt all danger, O Lord, when ſhall I come to the place of my purgation? but hauing her eyes vncouered, and ſeeing her ſelfe cleerly eſcaped, fell vpon her knees, and with teares, gaue thankes to her Deliuerer, whereby ſhe recouered, both the loue and her former eſtate of the King, with the good eſteeme and applauſe of the people: in memory whereof, ſhee gaue nine Mannors (according to the number of plough-ſhares to the Minſter of Wincheſter, (wherein ſhee had that triall,) and adorned the ſame with many rich ornaments; as likewiſe the King repenting the wrong he did her, beſtowed on the ſame place the Iland (ſo then it was) called Portland in Dorſet-ſhire, being about ſeuen miles in compaſſe: for ſo the chance, in thoſe dayes, was ſet, that whoſoeuer loſt, the Monkes euer wanne.

(24) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne wife, howſoeuer ſome haue cloaked that Fraud (ſo the Apoſtle tearmes it) vnder the faire robe of Chaſtitie. For he marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beautie and vertue, in whoſe breſt (ſaith Malmesbury) there was a Schoole of all Liberall Sciences, refuſed her bed: but whether it were for his debilitie, or hatred to Goodwin her Father, or loue of Virginitie, I determine not; but am fully perſwaded, that the accuſation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-biſhop did charge her, was more vpon enuy to her father, then truth of ſo foule a fact in her, whoſe vertues were ſo many, and ſo memorable, by report of Authors, that were eye-witneſſes themſelues; for Ingulphus that had often times conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was giuen (ſaith he) vnto King Edward for his Queene and Wife, the daughter of Goodwin, a moſt beautifull Damoſell, EGITHA by name; excellent well learned; in her demeanure, and whole courſe of life a Virgine moſt chaſt, humble, and vnfainedly holy, no way ſauouring of her Fathers or Brethrens barbarouſneſſe, but mild, modeſt, faithfull, and innocent, nor euer hurtfull to any; inſomuch, that this verſe was applied to her:

All theſe notwithſtanding, the King expulſed her his Court and Bed, and that with no little diſgrace; for taking all her goods from her, euen to the vttermoſt farthing, committed her priſoner to the Monaſtery of Wilton, attended only with one maid, where ſhee, for a whole yeares ſpace almoſt, in teares and prayers expected the day of her releaſe and comfort: All which vnprincely, and vnſpouſlike vſage, as the King pretended, and ſaid, was, becauſe ſhee onely ſhould not liue in comfort, when as her Parents and Brethren were baniſhed the Realme: an vniuſt ſentence ſurely, and vnbefitting a Saint, thus to puniſh the ſinnes of the fathers vpon their children, contrary to the preſcript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth againſt ſuch iniuſtice, and regulateth it with this iuſt verdict, That ſoule that ſinneth ſhall die: and for her pure and vnuiolated chaſtity, himſelfe on his death-bed ſpake, ſaying, that openly ſhe was his wife, but in ſecret imbracings as his owne ſiſter.

THE people sorrowing for the death of their KING, and the Statesmen perplexed for choyce of a new; Edgar Athelings title was worthy of more vnpartiall respect then it found: for him they held too young for gouernment: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking English: and withall, the prophecies of EDVVARD touching the alienation of the Crowne; the Interest of the Danes; and the claime that Duke

Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinitie,) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions; but nothing concluded for setling the State; no man either assuming or proffering the Diadem, because none had the power, or right to adorne therewith his own head. In this calme conference a sodaine gale arose, which blew all the sayles spred for that winde into one Port. And that was Harold sonne to Earle Goodwin, a man (duly prizing his many worthy parts) not vnmeet for a Kingdome; who first succeeding his father in his Dukedome; and next Edward (his brother in Law) in his Kingdome, in patience, clemency, and affabilitie bare himselfe most approuedly towards the vertuous, but with a Lyons courage, and fierce countenance chastised the disordered, and indeed became another Maccabeus vnto the distressed Land. (2) That he tooke part with his Father against Eustace of Bulloigne, and King Edwards hasty Commission, wee haue shewed; himselfe then enioying the Earldome of Oxford, and so affected by those of Essex, Suffolke, and Norfolke, Cambridge and Huntington-shires, that they sided in his cause against the King; But these designes failing, (as commonly it is seene all attempts of Subiects against their Soueraignes doe) hee learned by banishment, what was the losse of true honour, and by forbearance of battaile (when halfe the Kingdome stood for him) his dutie obliged vnto the Common-wealth. And growne againe into fauour with the King, carried himselfe answerably vnto both.

(3) Some iealousie conceiued; Edward without any cause, banished Algar the sonne of Leofrike Earle of Chester, who with the helpe of the Irish and Welsh-men, vnder the conduct of Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the English, putting Rodulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of fiue hundred men, spoyled the Citie, burnt the Minster and became Masters of mis-rule in those parts. Against these was Harold sent, and with such manhood pursued his flying enemies, that passing through North-Wales, vpon the Snow-downes hee pitched his Field: The Earle, and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his presence, fled thence vnto South-Wales, and againe tooke into Hereford; whereof Harold hauing intelligence hasted thither-ward (leauing sufficient in the Snow-downes to mate the Welsh,) and recouering the Citie, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the sauing of more bloud (and not vngratefull to Algar, who without grudge had resigned to him his Earldome, and whole Reuenewes at his returne from exile) a peace was concluded, and at Harolds request, Earle Algar and Prince Gruffith were pardoned.

(4) But Algar being againe accused, and againe ayded by his olde associate Gruffith, recouered his Earledome by force, whereat King Edward was highly displeased, but most against Gruffith, who euer was ready to assist any against him: whereupon Harold, the second time appointed Generall, with a great host entered North-Wales, without fight of enemy, where he onely burnt downe the stately Palace of Prince Gruffith, and so returned to the King. But long the Welsh were not quiet, nor the Prince pleased of the harmes to him done. Wherefore making his forces very strong he againe molested the English.

(7) His laſt imployment by holy King Edward, was againſt the tumultuous Northumbrians which had expulſed Toſto their Earle, and Harolds owne brother, where a peace was concluded without ſhedding bloud, but with condition that Toſto ſhould loſe his Earledome: whereupon in great diſpleaſure, hee with his wife and children fled into Flanders, and euer after hated the perſon, and emulated the glory of Harold. The originall of theſe two brethrens quarrels beganne at Windſor, where in the preſence of the King they fell from words vnto blowes, and that in ſuch manner, as if reſcue had not come, Toſto had dyed; for which diſgrace, he ſecretly hied him into the Marches of Wales, and neere the City Hereford at Portaſlyth, where Harold had a houſe, then in preparing to entertaine the King, hee ſlew all his brothers ſeruants, and them cutting peece-meale into gobbets, ſalted ſome of their limmes, and caſt the reſt into veſſels of the meath and wines, ſending his brother word, that he had furniſhed him with poudred meates againſt the Kings comming thither; which barbarous act cauſed deſeruedly his name to be odious vnto his Northumbrians, and was laſtly repayed with his owne death.

(8) Now albeit ſome Heralds make Harold by birth but a Gentleman of one, and the firſt deſcent, which, were it ſo, ſhould no whit blemiſh him who was more truely enobled with princely vertues; yet therein alſo it may ſeeme he is miſ-eſteemed, ſeeing his Father was Goodwin a Duke by degree, the ſonne of Wolnoth, and he the ſonne of Egelmar, who was the ſonne of Egelricke, ſurnamed Leofwine, and brother of Edricke Duke of Mercia, that married the daughter of King Ethelred of England, of whom we haue ſpoken.

M. Tho. Mills in Harold.

The mother of Harold was Githa the daughter of Duke Wolfe, and ſiſter to Sweyne the yonger, King of Denmarke, by Eſtrich his wife, who was ſiſter to Canute the great King of England; and himſelfe the ſecond ſonne of her borne; whoſe elder brother was Sweyne, that died on pilgrimage in his returne from Ieruſalem, and his yonger were Toſto, Wilnod, Girth, and Leofricke.

(9) A former wife Earle Goodwin had, whoſe name was Thira, the ſiſter of Canute, a woman ſolde vnto wickedneſſe, for making merchandize of Englands beauteous virgins into Denmarke; ſhee ſolde them there at deare rates, to ſatisfie her owne vnſatiate auarice, and the luſts of the laſciuious Danes, till a iuſt reward of Gods wrath fell on her by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, wherewith ſhe was ſlaine, to the great terrour of the beholders. One ſonne by her Earle Goodwin had, who when he was paſt childes age, riding vpon a horſe (the gift of his Grand-father the King,) proudly giuing him the reine and ſpurre, was violently borne into the riuer Thameſis, and ſo ſodainly drowned. (10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his ſucceſſor, Harold the ſecond day after, being the day of his buriall, made himſelfe King, none of the Nobilitie diſliking what he had done; for courteous he was of ſpeech and behauiour, and in martiall proweſſe the onely man, as Wales well witneſſed more then once; friended by affinitie with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Edgitha the daughter of Algar (ſiſter of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late wife to Gruffith ap Lhewelyn Prince of Wales) he expected to be both ſided and aſſiſted, if his cauſe came either to triall or voyce.

(11) And the time he well ſaw, fitted his his entrance; for Sweyne King of Denmarke (most dread by the English,) was intangled with the Sweden warres; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French King; the friends of Edgar in Hungary, and himselfe a stranger, ouer-young for rule: all which concurrents made Harold without deliberatiõ, or order from the State, to set the Crowne on his owne head, regardlesse of all ceremony and solemne celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, he too too much offended the Clergie.

(12) The day of his Coronation was vpon Friday, the fifth of Ianuary, being the feast of the Epiphany, and yeere of Saluation 1066. none either greatly applauding, or disapprouing his presumption, except onely for the omission of manner and forme; to redeeme which, and to re-gaine the good will of all; no sooner attained hee the seate-royall, but he remitted or diminished the grieuous customes and tributes which his predecessors had raised, a course euer powerfull to win the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men he was very munificent and carefull of their aduancements; and to grow more deepely into their venerable esteeme, he repaired their Monasteries, but most especially that at Waltham in Essex, which hee most sumptuously new built, and richly endowed, giuing it the name of Holy-Crosse; vpon occasion that such a Crosse found far Westward, was brought thither by miracle, vt tradunt: and therefore he chose out this place to poure forth his supplications, before he marched to meete Duke William in the field. Moreouer, to satisfie such Nobles as affected young Edgars iuster title, he created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in speciall fauour: in briefe, vnto the poore, his hand was euer open, vnto the oppressed he ministred iustice, and vnto all men was affable, and meeke: and all to hold that vpright which on his head he had set with an vn-euen hand: and depriued him of, vnto whom he was a Protector.

(13) Three seuerall reports are affirmed of Edwards disposse of the Crowne: the first was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the secõd was to yong Edgar, vnto whom he was great Vncle; and the last vnto this Harold himselfe: for so saith Edmerus, and also Marianus, who liued at the very same time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was sacred and crowned by Aldredus, Arch-bishop of Yorke; so that here by he is freed by some from the imputation of intrusion and wrong.

(14) His State thus standing, and his Subiects contentment daily increasing, presently it was somewhat perplexed by an Ambassage sent from the Norman, putting him in minde of his couenant, and oath, as well for the custody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the solemnization of the marriage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himselfe now surely seated in the hearts of his Subiects, and therefore also sure in his Kingdome, answered the Ambassadors, That hee held their Masters demaund vniust, for that an oath extorted in time of extremitie, cannot binde the maker in conscience to performe it, for that were to ioyne one sinne with another; and that this oath was taken for feare of death or imprisonment, the Duke himselfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare; could I (said he) then a subiect, without the allowance of the King, and the whole State, giue away the Crownes succession to the preiudice of both? surely a Kingdome is of a better account then to be so determined in priuate onely betwixt two. With which kinde of answeres he sent the messengers away.

Subiects loue the Soueraignes strength.

(16) The Norman, who till then thought England sure to be his, and had deuoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, stormed to see himselfe thus frustrated on the sodaine, and in stead of a Crowne to haue scornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this sleight answere, returned his Ambassadors againe vnto Harold, by whom he laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Court of France had faithfully promised the succession vnto him, and againe afterwards ratified the same to him at his being in England, and that not done without consent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea and by Harold himselfe, and so firmely assured that his Brother and Nephew were deliuered for pledges, and to that end sent vnto him into Normandy: that he had no way beene constrained, he appealed to Harolds owne conscience, who besides his voluntary offer to sweare, contracted himselfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) vpon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as fit for a Crowne as any others, meant nothing leſſe then to lay it downe vpon parley; and therefore told them flatly, that howſoeuer Edward and he had tempered for the Kingdome, yet Edward himſelfe comming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promiſe was of no validitie; for how could hee giue that whereof he was not intereſſed, nor in the Danes time was euer like to be? And tell your Duke (ſaid he) that our Kingdome is now brought to a ſetled eſtate, and with ſuch loue and liking of the Engliſh, as that they will neuer admit any more a ſtranger to rule ouer them. And as touching the contract with his younger daughter, he well ſeeth, that God hath taken away that occaſion of alienating the Crowne, and ſurely his Law hath likewiſe prouided remedy againſt ſuch raſh vowes; whoſe precepts I meane to follow: and therefore (ſaid he) will your Duke to weigh my eſtate with his owne, both his and mine now in quiet, and ſufficient for two, and either of them, employment enough for one mans Gouernment, and therefore both of them too much to be well gouerned by one, ſeeing that God himſelfe had ſet a Sea betwixt them. With theſe and the like ſpeeches hee ſhifted off the Dukes Ambaſſadors; without all princely entertainements, or courteous regard.

(18) The meſſengers returned, and Harolds anſwere declared, William Lion-like enraged, caſteth his thoughts about plotting reuenge, & making ſome oddes euen that might impeach his deſignes, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewiſe not ſleeping his buſineſſe, made ready his Fleet, muſtered his ſouldiers, and planted his Garriſons along the Sea-coaſt. But in theſe his proceedings, behold a great and fearefull Comete appeared (ſeldome a ſigne to Princes of fortunate ſucceſſe) vpō the twenty fourth of Aprill, and laſted onely ſeauen dayes, which drew the mindes of the Engliſh, into great ſuſpenſe, now ready to enter into a double warre.

(19) For as William the Norman for his part claimed England by gift; ſo Harfager the Dane did by ſucceſſion; the rumors of both which, greatly terrified the hearts of the Inhabitants: and yet behold, a third terrour vnexpected, contrary to nature, and moſt mens opinions, ſodainely aroſe: for Toſto the cruell Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expulſed by his people, and preſcribed by King Edward, fled into France, where by the inſtigations of William, whoſe wiues ſiſter he had married (both of them the daughters of Baldwine Earle of Flanders,) hee got for his reuenge a Fleet furniſhed with men at Armes; and thus prepared, his firſt fury was ſhewed in ſpoyling the Ile of Wight; then coaſting the ſhore, ſhrewdly endammaged Kent, whence hoiſing ſaile, fel foule vpon Lincolne-ſhire; whence Morcar and Edwine Earles of Cheſter and Yorke-ſhire, ayded with the Kings Nauie, droue him from thence, though with ſome loſſe of their men.

Matth Weſtmin. Rand Higden. Will. Malmeſb.

(20) Toſto for more ſuccour fled into Scotland, where of King Malcolme hee had but cold comfort, himſelfe being buſied with ciuill broiles; but howſoeuer his expectation there failed, yet his purpoſes were continued with the aſſiſtance of Harold Harfager (that is, the Faire-lockes) King of Denmark, who with three hundred ſhippes had entred the riuer Tyne for Englands Inuaſion, after his Conqueſt of the Iles of Orknes. Toſto therefore ioyning his Fleete to theſe Danes, in warlike brauery, both of them enter the mouth of Humber, & drawing vp the Riuer Ouſe, at Rich-hall landed their men, making ſpoile of the Country whereſoeuer they came. To meet with theſe, the foreſaid Earles Edwin and Morcar, in a tumultuous haſte raiſed their powers, but were ſo ouerlaid by the Norwegians, that many were ſlaine, and more drowned, in paſſing ouer that Riuer.

(21) The enemy growne proud by this late victory, haſted towards Yorke, the chiefe Citie of the North; where planting his ſiege, it was preſently yeelded vp, and hoſtages deliuered vpon both parts for the performance of couenants. The Danes thus proſpering, had moſt ſtrongly encamped themſelues; for backed they were with the German Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the Riuer Humber, wherein alſo their Fleet rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the Riuer Derwent; ſo that it ſeemed impoſſible to raiſe this ſiege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coaſts cleere from all danger, the Equinoctiall at hand, and Nauigation now paſt, the victuals in his Fleete ſpent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders, that Duke William meant not his voyage that yeare, was about to disband his Army. When this ſodaine newes from the North pierced his eare, no need it was then to bid him make haſte thither, the caſe ſtanding ſo ſo neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, poſted to Yorke, and from thence marched againſt the Norwegians, who lay ſecured with ſuch aduantage, as we haue ſaid. Notwithſtanding, Harold couragiouſly ordered his battle, and aſſayed to paſſe the Bridg called Stamford, built ouer Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time againſt his whole hoſt, and with his Axe ſlew forty of his men, till laſtly this Dane was ſlaine with a dart.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the Engliſh reduced into their rankes, Harold moſt boldly ſet vpon his enemies euen in their Campe; where the battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till laſtly the Norwegians diſarraied and ſcattered, were ſlaine outright; and among them the two Chiefetaines, Harfager and Toſto, with many others of worth and account, loſt their liues. Olaue the ſonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkeney, who kept their Fleet and Seas, whileſt his Father and followers fought vpon Land, were brought to King Harold, who to haue their liues ſpared, abiured the Land, thenceforth to attempt no hoſtilitie againſt the Engliſh peace; and with twenty ſmall veſſels to carry away their ſlaine and hurt, were ſuffered to depart, bringing heauy newes into Denmarke of the loſſe of their King, and ouerthrow of his Army.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell vnto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and ſiluer, beſides the great Armado of Toſto and Harfager; whereby his minde was ſoone ſet aloft, and he beganne to grow both proud, and odious vnto his Army, the rather, for that he diuided not the ſpoiles vnto them that had deſerued it; a wrong that the common ſouldier doth continually murmure at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harolds fortunes, William the Norman had the more leiſure to ſtrengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about ENGLANDS inuaſion, found them euer reſolute and cheerefull that way; the difficultie onely reſted, how to prouide money enough, the very ſinewes whereby the vaſt body of an Army muſt be knit, and ſtrengthened: for a ſubſidy being propounded vnto the aſſembly of the Norman States, it was anſwered, that a former warre againſt the French had empoueriſhed much of their wealth, that if new wars were now raiſed, and therein their ſubſtance ſpent to gaine other parts, it would be thereby ſo waſted, as that hardly it would be ſufficient to defend their owne; that they thought it more ſafetie to hold what he had, then on hazard of their owne to inuade the territories of others; and that this warre intended, iuſt though it were, yet ſeemed not neceſſary, but exceeding dangerous; beſides (ſay they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military ſeruices in forraine parts, and therefore ſuch payments could not be aſſeſſed vpon them. And although William Fitz-Oſberne, a man in high fauour with the Duke, and as gratious among the people, endeauoured by all meanes to effect it, yea, and (to draw on others by his example) proffered to ſet out forty tall Ships vpon his owne charges towards this warre; yet would it not be: Therefore Duke William be-thought him on another way.

(26) The wealthieſt men among all his People he ſent for, and ſeuerally one by one conferred with, ſhewing them his right and hopes of England, wherein preferment lay euen to the meaneſt amongſt them, onely money was the want, which they might ſpare; neither ſhould that be giuen, nor lent without a plentifull increaſe: with ſuch faire words hee drew them ſo on, that they ſtroue who ſhould giue moſt, and by this policie he gathered ſuch a maſſe of money, as was ſufficient to defray the warre. Then went he to his neighbour Princes, namely, to the Earles of Anion, Poicton, Mayne, and Bulloigne, promiſing them faire poſſeſſions in England; yea, and vnto Philip the French King, in caſe he would ayde him, he voluntarily offered to become his vaſſal and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty vnder him. But it being thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not ſo pliable to the French King as was wiſhed, ſhould be bettered in his eſtate by the addition of ſo mighty a Kingdome (the power of Neighbour Potentates being euer ſuſpected of Princes) ſo farre was the King from yeelding any helpe, that hee ſecretly maligned, and openly diſſwaded this his attempt of inuading England. This French iealouſie, the Norman ſoone perceiued, which made him to caſt about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne vnto Alexander the second, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done vnto Robert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a text that might not be read without a glosse,) hee was so fauoured of his Holinesse (whose See was euer glad to interest it selfe in disposing of Crownes) that he both allowed well of his enterprize, and sent him a consecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himselfe had none such in his Boate) to be borne in the Ship, wherein himselfe in that expedition should take sayle for England: an Agnus Dei, and one of the haires of Saint Peter, that blessed Apostle, in whose vertue was no little trust: and accursed al them that should oppose themselues against him: for euen then the Popes had begun to vsurpe authoritie ouer Princes, and with their leaden blades to hacke into the steely swords of Emperours.

(28) Thus furnished on all sides, hee assembled his forces, and with a mightie Nauy came to the Towne of Saint Valeries; which standeth vpon the mouth of the Riuer Some: where a long time hee lay wind-bound, to his great discontentment, and with many vowes importunating the fauour of that locall Saint, heaped daily a number of gifts and oblations vpon his Altar; till lastly his desire was obtained, and then with three hundred Ships fraught full of his Normans, Flemings, French-men, and Britaines, waighed Anchor, and with a gentle gale of winde arriued at Peuensey in Sussex, vpon the twenty eight day of September, where Landing his men, to cut off all occasion or hope of returne, he fired his owne fleete, and vpon the Shoare erected a Fortresse to be if neede were, a retiring place for his Souldiers.

(29) At his arriuage from Sea, as our Historians report, his foot chanced to slippe, so that not able to recouer himselfe, he fell into the mud, and all to bemired his hands; which accident was presently construed for a lucky presage: for now (said a Captaine) O Duke, thou hast taken possession, and holdest that Land in thy hand, whereof shortly thou shalt become King: As Cæsar is said to haue done, when he entred into Africa, who from ship-board at his landing fell into the sands, and merily said, I doe now take possession of thee, O Africa.

(30) From Peuensey Duke William departed towards Hasting, where raising another Fortification, divulged to all, the causes of his comming, as pretending to reuenge both the death of his Normans, slaine by the treachery of Goodwin and Harold, and the wrongs and banishment of Robert Gemeticus, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, pretenses very slender, and enforced out of season: but surely had not a third fate neerer his heart, the two former would haue passed without the spleene of reuenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceased, whereon hee built his claime to the English Crowne. And there also by his Edict, he straitly charged his souldiers not in hostile manner, to wrong any of their persons, who shortly were to become his Subiects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of these newes, hasted with his Armie (whose Armour yet reaked with the bloud of the Norwegians) towards the South, and with such power as possibly he could make, entreth London, where immediatly a messenger from Duke William was presented vnto him, demanding no lesse then the Kingdome, and Harolds vassalage; vrging the same with such instant boldnesse, that Harolds furious indignation could hardly forbeare, against the law of Armes, to lay violent hands vpon the Ambassador; so great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to shew both, with very great boldnesse, he dispatcheth his Ambassadors to William, and by way of irefull checkes menaceth him, vnlesse forthwith he departed backe into Normandy, when presently mustering his men at London, he found them much lessened by his battaile against the Norwegians; notwithstanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their natiue Country inflamed, did ingage themselues for the field, against his common and dangerous enemy. He therefore with an vndaunted courage, led forth his Army into Sussex (against the importunate suit of his mother, who sought by all meanes to stay him) where on a large and faire plaine, scarce seauen miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his Battailes, and sent forth his Espials to descry his power.

(32) These comming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and presented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to be led from Tent to Tent, to be feasted, and dismissed, without any harme or dishonour done. These returning to Harold told what they had seene, ſeene, commending the Duke in his Martiall Prouiſions, and his clemency to them-ward, onely ſaid they, his Souldiers ſeeme to be Prieſts, for their faces were all ſhauen, whereas the vſe of the Engliſh was then to reſerue onely the vpper-lippe vncut, retaining or renewing the olde manner of the ancient Britaines, ſo deſcribed by Cæſar: but King Harold, who had beene in that Country, well knowing their errour, replied that they were men of great valour and ſtout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which ſpeech, Girth, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exployts, tooke occaſion to aduiſe the King from being preſent at the danger of the Field: for "(ſaid he) it ſtands not with the rule of "policy, to hazard all in the triall of one "battell, nor to depend vpon the euent "of warre, which euer is doubtfull, vic- "tory being as often gotten by fortune, "as valour; mature deliberation doth of- "ten produce the ſafeſt iſſues, and a pro- "uident delay is held to be the greateſt "furtherer of martiall proiects; neither "will any thing ſtrike greater terror into "the Normans, then thou to be leuying, "and enrolling a new Army, whereby "they may euer exſpect, and feare ſuc- "ceeding Battails. Againe (ſaid he) thou "beſt knoweſt what oath thine owne "mouth hath made vnto William; if law- "full, and willingly, then withdraw thy "ſelfe from field, leaſt for that thy ſinne "the whole Hoſt periſh; for there can be "no power againſt God. I am free from "ſuch guilt, and therefore may the bol- "der fight, and either defeat this dange- "rous enemy, or more cheerfully dye in "the defence of my country; and if thou "wilt commit the fortune of Battaile "into my gouernance, aſſure thy ſelfe I "will performe to thee the part of a lo- "uing Brother, and to my Countrimen "of a valiant Captaine.

(33) This wiſe aduice notwithſtanding, deſtiny ſo driuing him, he gaine-ſtood, imputing it a part of diſhonour, and not befitting a Souldier, (as hee alwayes had beene,) to leaue the field Coward-like, when greateſt glory was to be wonne, or in caſe of fortunate ſucceſſe, to be depriued of a part, and therefore reproued his brother for making this motion, and with diſdainefull ſpeeches, vnder-valued and embaſed the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, and both the Hoſts ſtanding ready for fight, the Norman, to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, vpon a pious affection, ſent a Monke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of theſe conditions, either wholly to reſigne the Kingdome vnto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soueraigne: or elſe in ſingle combat to try the quarrell with him, in ſight of the Armies; or laſtly, to ſtand to the arbitrement of the Pope, touching the poſſeſſion & wearing of the Engliſh Crown. But Harold, as one whom the heauens would depreſſe, accepting neither domeſticke counſell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter vnto the Tribunall of G O D, and anſwered, that it ſhould be tryed the next day with more ſwords then one.

(35) The next day was the 14. of October, which vpon a credulous errour, he held euer to be fortunate, becauſe it was the day of his Natiuitie, and with hopefull aſſurance, deſired greatly the approach of the ſame: His ſouldiers likewiſe as men whoſe heads were to be crowned with the Laurels of Victory, gaue themſelues to licentious reuels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noiſes, ſpent the night; whereas contrariwiſe, the Normans, more wiſely, and ſeriouſly weighing the buſineſſe in hand, beſtowed the time in prayers and vowes, for the ſafetie of their Army, and victorious ſucceſſe: neither had the morning ſooner ſpread it ſelfe but their battel was ordered, and prepared for fight.

(36) Harold alſo with the like forwardneſſe, marſhalled his battaile, placing in the Vant-guard the Kentiſh-men (who by an ancient cuſtome had the front of the battaile belonging to them) with their heauy axes, or halberts. The Middleſex-men and the Londoners were in that ſquadron, whereof himſelfe with his brother had the leading. Tho. Mill.

(37) His enemies Vaward was led by Roger of Mount-gomery, and William Fitz-Oſberne, the ſame conſiſting of horſemen out of Anion, Perch, and little Britaine. Their Maine-Battaile conſiſted of Poictouins and Germanes, Geffrey Martell, and a Germane Penſioner commanding them: In the Rere-guard was the Duke himſelfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobility and Gentry; all which Battallions were intermingled with companies of Archers.

(38) The Normans without any confuſed, or diſorderly ſhout, ſounded the battaile, battaile, and aduanced forward, discharging a fierce volley of arrows like a tempestuous haile, a kinde of fight both strange, and terrible vnto the English, who supposed their enemy had beene already euen in the middest amongst them; when presently a furious charge was giuen to the Va-ward of the English, who resolutely had determined to couer the place with their bodies rather then to giue one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themselues close together, whereby they valiantly, and with the slaughter of many, put backe the enemy: which was so farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more whetted to re-enforce themselues vpon them: when with an horrible noise, the battailes on both sides gaue the stroke; and now come foot to foot, and man to man, coped together in a most cruell fight. The English standing thicke, and close, as if they had beene stucke one to another, abode the brunt and charge of the Normans, and with such welcomes, that after many a bloudy wound receiued, they were at point to recoyle, had not Duke William, whose crowne lay now at stake, both brauely performed the part of a Leader, and with his presence, and authoritie restrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans horsemen brake into the troupes of the English, and sore distressed the Souldiers on foot, yet notwithstanding they still held out, and kept their array vnbroken: for Harold (no lesse carefull to keepe then the other to gaine a Diadem,) as a most valiant Captaine bare himselfe worthily euery where. The Duke well perceiuing that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could be got, betooke himselfe to a stratagem, and commanded his men to sound the retreat, but kept them still in such order of array, that they gaue backe in as good discipline as they came on.

will. Malmesb. Henry Hunt.

(39) The English supposing the Normans to haue fled, and themselues the masters of the field, began in eager pursuit carelesly to vntwist, and display their ranckes; when on the sodaine, the Normans hauing their wished opportunitie, and winding about, charged the enemy afresh; who now being scatteringly disranked, and out of all order, were slaine downe on all sides, not able to recouer their battaile: many thus borne downe, and slaine, none by flight sought to escape the field, but rather to maintain their honour in Armes, cast themselues into a round, choosing there to die in the cause of their Country, then cowardly to forsake the Standard of their King: and therefore with bold resolutions encouraging one another, they turne head and resist a long time: but showers of arrowes like a stormie tempest falling thicke among them, one, most fatall, and vnlucky for the English, wounded Harold into the braines through the left eye; so that falling from his horse to the ground, was vnder his owne standard slaine.

(40) And yet Giraldus Cambrensis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the issue of this Battaile somewhat otherwise, affirming, that Harold with losse of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the Citie of Westchester, and there long after led a holy life, and made a godly end, as an Anchoret in the Cell of Saint Iames, fast by the Church of S. Iohn. With Harold died his Brethren Gyrth, and Leofwine, with most of the English Nobility, besides the slaughter of sixtie-seauen thousand, nine hundred seuentie-foure of their Souldiers: Bremensis saith an hundred thousand.

(41) Duke William in this Battaile had three horses slaine vnder him; God (saith Marianus) so defending his person, that though multitude of darts were throwne against him, yet not a drop of his bloud was spilt by the Enemy, and this Battaile wonne with the losse onely of sixe thousand, and thirteene of his men. Whose wodden bowes (as Iohn Rouse is of opinion) gained the Normans that great victory; for the Arrowes shot leuell, or directly forward, wounded the English that stood in the front, and vpright; the other shot on high, galled at the fall, those that were more remote, and the backes of such as stooped to shun the danger.

(42) This battaile was fought in Sussex, seauen miles from Hastings, vpon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yeare of Grace 1066. Wherein the dolefull destruction of the English fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans, euen in the shutting of the day, did arise; when perished the Royall bloud of the Saxons, whose Kings first had made this Kingdome into Seuen, and afterward of them so glorious a Monarchy, that it was not inferiour to any in Europe, and her Monarchs so renowned for princely magnanimitie, as that many of them were ranked ranked with the beſt in the world: But now the all-ordering hand of God (vnto whoſe becke not onely this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but euen the heauens themſelues, and all the powers thereof muſt bow) either for the ſinnes of the Engliſh, which were many, and great, or to graffe one more faire and longer-continuing bud vpon this dryed, and decayed ſtock, brought that forreine offſpring into this his nurſery of Britaine; whoſe branches, as the Vine, haue ſpread both fruitfull and farre; and whoſe roots are faſtened as the trees of Libanon: the Kings thereof, euen from the loynes of this Great Conquerour, holding on a royall ſucceſſion for the ſpace of theſe fiue hundred fortie fiue yeares, their iſſues topped with the higheſt Cedars of the world, and their branches ſpread thorowout all Chriſtendome; which we pray may ſtill proceede and continue, whileſt the Sunne and Moone haue their being.

Hoſea 14. 6.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke William wholly aſcribed vnto God, and by way of a ſolemne ſupplication or proceſſion gaue him the thankes; and pitching for that night his Pauilion among the bodies of the dead, the next day returned to Haſtings, there to conſult vpon his great, and moſt proſperouſly begun enterpriſe, giuing firſt commandement for the buriall of his ſlaine Souldiers.

(44) But Morcar, and Edwin, the vnfortunate Queenes Brethren, by night eſcaping the battaile, came vnto London, where with the reſt of the Peeres, they beganne to lay the foundation of ſome freſh hopes, poſting thence their meſſengers to raiſe a new ſupply, and to comfort the Engliſh (who through all the Land were ſtricken into a fearefull aſtoniſhment with this vnexpected newes) from a deſpairing feare, ſhewing the chance of Warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines ſufficient to try another Field. Alfred, Arch-biſhop of Yorke, there preſent, and Preſident of the Aſſembly, ſtoutly, and prudently gaue his counſell forthwith to conſecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King; to whom conſented likewiſe both the Sea-Captaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkeſhire and Cheſhire, Edwin and Morcar (whom this fearefull ſtate of their country could not diſſwade from diſloyaltie and ambition) plotting ſecretly to get the Crown to themſelues, hindred that wiſe and noble deſigne. In which while, the ſorrowfull Queene their ſiſter was conueyed to weſtcheſter, where, without ſtate or title of a Queene, ſhe led a ſolitary and quiet life.

(45) The Mother of the ſlaine King did not ſo well moderate her womanly paſſions, as to receiue either comfort, or counſell of her friends: the dead body of her ſonne ſhee greatly deſired, and to that end ſent to the Conquerour two ſage Brethren of his Abbey at Waltham, who had accompanied him in his vnfortunate expedition: Their names (as I finde them recorded in an olde Manuſcript) were Oſegod and Ailric, whoſe meſſage to the Conquerour not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there ſet downe in the tenour as followeth.

(48) With which his courteous ſpeech and promiſes, the two religious Fathers comforted, and encouraged, againe replied.

" (49) Not ſo, noble Duke, but grant " this thy ſeruants moſt humble requeſt, that " we may, for God, by thy leaue, receiue the " dead body of our Founder, and to bury it " in the place which himſelf in his life time " appointed; that wee cheered with the pre- " ſence of his body, may thereof take com- " fort, and that his Tombe may be vnto our " Succeſſors, a perpetuall Monument of his " remembrance.

(50) The Duke, as he was of diſpoſition gracious, & inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their deſires: whereupon they drew out ſtore of gold to preſent him in way of gratulation; which he not onely vtterly refuſed, but alſo offered them plenty to ſupply whatſoeuer ſhould be needful for the pompe of his funerall, as alſo for their coſts in trauaile to and fro; giuing ſtrait commandement that none of his Souldiers ſhould preſume to moleſt them in this their buſineſſe, or in their returne. Then went they in haſte to the quarry of the dead, but by no meanes could finde the body of the King, for that the countenances of all men greatly after by death; but being maimed and imbrued with bloud, they are not knowne to be the men they were. As for his other regall ornaments, which might haue ſhewed him for their King, his dead corps was deſpoyled of them, either through the greedy deſire of prey, (as the manner of the Field is) or to be the firſt bringer of ſuch happy newes, in hope of a Princely reward; vpon which purpoſe many times the body is both mangled and diſmembred: and ſo was this King after his death by a baſe Souldier gaſht and hackt into the legge, whom Duke William rewarded for ſo vnſouldier-like a deed, caſhiering him for euer out of his wages and warres. So that Harold lying ſtript, wounded, bemangled, and goared in his bloud, could not be found or knowne, till they ſent for a woman named Editha (for her paſſing beautie ſurnamed Swan-ſhals, that is, Swanſ-necke, whom hee entertained in ſecret loue before he was King, who by ſome ſecret markes of his body to her well knowne, found him out; and then put into a coffine, was by diuers of the Norman Nobilitie honourably brought vnto the place, afterward called Battle-Bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of England, and ſo conueyed to Waltham, was there ſolemnely, and with great lamentation of his mother, royally interred, with this rude Epitaph, well beſeeming the time, though not the perſon.

Hen cadit hoſte fero, Rex à Duce Rege futuro,
Par paris in gladio, militæ & valido.
Firmini inſtis lux eſt tibi, luce Calixti;
Pronior hinc ſuperas, hinc ſuperatus eras.
Ergo tibi requiem depoſcat vtrumque perennem:

Both peeres, both peerles, both feard, and both feareleſſe;

Th'one helpe thee to vanquiſh, th'other made thee languiſh;
Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem ſay;
So let good men all, to God for thee call.

(51) This Kings raigne was not ſo full of dayes as of great troubles: being but the ſpace of nine moneths & nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period of the Saxons Empire in Britaine, after they had continued from their firſt erected Kingdome by Hengiſt in Kent, the ſpace of ſixe hundred and ten yeares, without any reuerſement or interruption, ſauing the ſmall Inter-Raignes of theſe three Daniſh Kings, of whom we haue ſpoken. And although Aimund of Breme, in the fauour of his Danes, ſharpely taxeth this Harold as being an impious man, and that by vſurpation he aſpired to the Crowne, yet doth Ealred the Abbot of Rinauxe, (the Legender of S. Edwards life) much commend him for his courteous affabilitie, gentle deportment, and Iuſtice, and for his warlike proweſſe none matchable vnto him; and was reputed (ſaith he) verily a man paſsing well furniſhed with all vertues befitting a Soueraigne Commander, and borne euen to repaire the decayed ſtate of England; had he not, in the haughtineſſe and opinion of his owne valour and prudence, ſo much addicted himſelfe to his owne reſolutions, and too much neglected the wiſe deliberations of his beſt friends and Counſellers.

(52) The firſt wife of Harold, whom he had married and buried before hee was was King, I finde not named by any of our writers; but that he had such an one, appeareth, where it is recorded that he was a widower, what time he contracted the Conquerors daughter; & that also he had children of such age, that they made warres against King William in the second of his raigne; which it is probable, he had not by Editha, his Swans-neck, but were legitimate, & by this lawful, though nameles mother.

(53) Algith, the second wife to King Harold, was the widow of Gruffith ap Lhewelyn King of North-wales, the sister of Edwine & Morcar, Earles of Yorkshire, and Chester, and daughter of Algar son of Leofricke, son of Leofwine, all Earles of Chester, Leicester and Lincolne: She was married vnto him being then but Duke, in the last yeare of Edward Confessors raigne, and of Grace 1065 neither did she long enioy him, or her Queenly title, after his aspiring to the Crowne; for being resident in London when he was slaine, from thence she was cõueied by her brethrẽ to Westchester, where she remained in meane estate, and in good quiet (which vsually most attends the meanest) without any princely shew or name, during the rest of her life, which lasted a great part of the Conquerours raigne. His Issue.

(54) Goodwine the eldest sonne of King Harold, being growne to some ripenesse of yeers in ỹ life of his Father, after his death and ouerthrow by the Conqueror, tooke his brother with him, and fled ouer into Ireland: from whence he returned, and landed in Sommerset-shire, slew Ednoth (a Baron sometime of his Fathers) that encountred him, and taking great preyes in Deuonshire and Cornewall, departed till the next yeare. When comming againe, he fought with Beorn an Earle of Cornwall, and after retired into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke, to King Swayn his Cosen-german, where he spent the rest of his life.

(55) Edmund, the second sonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland, returned with him into England, and was at the slaughter and ouerthrow of Ednoth and his power in Sommerset-shire; at the spoyles committed in Cornwall and Deuonshire; at the conflict with the Cornish Earle Beorn; passed and repassed with him in all his voyages, inuasions and warres, by sea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the last departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleasure and calamitie whatsoeuer, and attending and depending wholly vpon him, liued and died with him in that Country.

(56) Magnus, the third sonne of King Harold, went with his brothers into Irelãd, and returned with them the first time into England, and is neuer after that mentioned amongst them, nor elsewhere, vnlesse, (as some coniecture) he be that Magnus who seeing the mutability of humane affaires, became an Anchoret, whose Epitaph pointing to his Danish originall, the learned Clarenciaux discouered in a little desolate Church at Lewes in Sussex, where in the gaping chinkes of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and ouer-worne Character, certaine old imperfect verses were found, which he supposeth should be thus read; M. Ferrat. Camb. in Sussex.

*He * Magnus hight, great name, note of great place:*
*But Magnus left, an * Agnus milde he prou'de,*
From world bereft, an Anchorite beseem'd.

* A Lambe.

(57) Wolfe the fourth son of King Harold, seemeth to be borne of Queene Algith his second Wife, for that hee was neuer mentioned among his other brethren, and hauing better friends by his mothers side, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he spoken of, during all the raigne of the Conquerour, & therefore at his entrance may probably bee thought to haue beene but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his prisoners with Earle Morcar (his Vnckle, if Queen Algith were his mother) & was by King William Rufus released, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Gunhild a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by Iohn Capgraue (the Writer of the English Saints) in the life of Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, reporting her to haue beene a Nunne in a Monastery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the said Wolstan, (which he numbreth by tale, according to the superstitious manner of the time wherein he liued) declareth, how he restored this Lady to her perfect eye-sight, wherof by a dangerous infirmitie, shee was almost wholly, and in most mens opinions, vncurably depriued. Iohn Capgraue.

(59) Another daughter of K. Harold not named by any Story-writer of our owne natiõ, is mentioned by Saxo Grãmaticus, in his Danish history, to haue come into Denmark, with her two brethrẽ, to haue bin very honourably entertained by King Swain the yonger, her kinsman: and afterwards to haue bin as honourably placed in mariage with Gereslef, called in latin Iarislaues, & of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Russians: & by him to haue had a daughter, that was ỹ mother of Waldemar, the first of that name King of Denmark, from whom all the Danish Kings for many ages after succeeded. Saxo Grammaticus lib. 11.

THE

THE SVCCESSION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHS FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE Normans, vnder WILLIAM the CONQVEROVR: vntill the regall Rights of the whole Iland were, by Gods prouidence, vnited vnder one Imperiall Diadem, in the perſon of our preſent SOVERAIGNE King IAMES, ſole Monarch of Great Britaine: Their ſeuerall Acts, Iſſues, Raignes, Armes, Seales, and Coines.

THE NINTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER I.

WHat hath beene ſpoken touching the Originalls, Lawes, and Cuſtomes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient Conquerours, and poſſeſſors of this our Iland, may in like ſort be ſaid of the Normãs (being a branch from the ſame roote) of whom wee are now to write, ſauing onely that the name is not ſo ancient, and therefore their Manners may be thought more ciuill. Through the miſty-darke times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britaines, (wherein no brighter Sunne did ſhine vnto vs) by the aſſiſtance of the all-ſeeing power, which bringeth light out of darkeneſſe, I am laſtly approached to theſe times of more light, and vnto affaires of more certaine truth: whoſe Current, to my ſeeming, is made now Nauigable, by the many Writers that haue emptied their full channels into this Sea, wherein, though in reſpect of my owne defects, and that ſo many Maſter-Pilots haue ſailed before mee, it may ſeeme but preſumption to direct another courſe, with a purpoſe to better what they haue ſo well performed; yet to make a compleate Hiſtory from the firſt to the laſt: giue me leaue to continue, as I haue begunne.

(2) Theſe Normans then, being anciently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedens, and Danes, tooke their Name of that Northern Climate from whence they came firſt, which was that Coaſt of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, & Norway, for that it tendeth in reſpect of ſituation ſo farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adiacent, the Saxons, Iutes, Angles, and lately the Danes, made their incurſions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therefore as the wombe of conception, by the diſpoſe of the Omnipotent, after it had produced thoſe Nations which formerly made Conqueſts of Britaine, now againe brought forth (as it were) her laſt-borne Beniamin, who deuouring the prey in the Morning, hath diuided the ſpoile in the Euening, and hitherto continued their glorious fame atchieued; which I pray, may extend to the laſt period of Times being: For theſe Normans, firſt by force got footing in France, with the Dominion and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the laſt and moſt famous Monarchs of the ſame.

Gen. 49. 27.

(4) Theſe, formerly practizing Piracies vpon the Coaſts of Belgia, Frizia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courses euen to the Mediterranean Sea: in so much that Charles the Great, seeing their roauing tall ships, and considering the bold attempts they vndertooke, with a deepe sigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to haue said: Heauy am I at the very heart, that in my own life time, these Pirates dare to come vpon my Coasts, whereby I foresee what mischiefe they will worke vpon my Posteritie. Which indeede proued so great, that in their publike Processions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, good Lord deliuer vs. This feare, & prayer notwithstanding, they draue the French to such extremity, that King Charles the Bald was forced to giue vnto Hasting a Norman Arch-pirate, the Earledome of Charters, for to asswage his fury exercised vpon his People; and againe, King Charles the Grosse, granted vnto Godfrey the Norman, part of Neustria, with his Daughter in marriage: Yet all this sufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes seated themselues neere vnto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay comprised betwixt that Riuer and the Riuer Loyre: which * Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Nor-manny from these Northerne Guests, at what time King Charles the Simple, confirmed it vnto Rollo their Captaine.

Rollo. Alb. Krantius.

Polyebr. lib. 6. cap. 2.

(5) This Rollo, as say the Danish Historians, was the sonne of Guion, a great Lord in Denmarke, who with his brother Gonrin were appointed to depart the Country (according to the Danish customes) to seeke their aduentures abroad, & leaue more room for the rest at home; but these refusing the order, made warre vpon the King, in which, both Guion the Father and Gonrin the sonne, were slaine, and Rollo forced to flie for safeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to seeke Fortunes Court, and not a few mis-doers or out-lawed-men: whose Acts in England registred by Albertus Krantius, seeing they vary from our owne Historians in circumstances of times, and names, I haue chosen in this place to insert, leauing the credit thereof to him the Reporter.

(6) Rollo, a Noble-man of Denmarke, (saith he) and too powerfull in his Kings eye, was forced with a Nauy to aduenture his Fortunes into forreine parts, whose first arriuage, as he saith, was in England, where many of the Danish Nobilitie had formerly tryed their valours, and some of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that Kingdome. Indeed, (saith he) England from the beginning was not gouerned by one King, as now it is, for the Angle-Saxons had their prouince, and the Mercians theirs, both gouerned by Prouinciall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King; as the Scots and Picts also, in the same Iland had kept their owne limits vnder the like Gouernment. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their chiefest abiding, and in this Prouince Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre vpon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Nauy lying vpon the Seas: and proceeding forward into the Continent, tooke great booties both of men, cattle, and other spoyles, lading their Ships as they lay at Anchor: the Inhabitants of the Country making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtfull and in suspence what to doe, desired indeed to returne to his Country, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way, next he affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the people being exasperated against him for the harmes he had done them: but chiefly the Diademe of England ran most in his minde, though he knew the hazard was great, to match his small forces with an Host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe he seemed to sit in the Kingdome of France, vpon a high hill, bending his head forward to a Riuer which issued from the top of a Mountaine, at the foote whereof beneath him, he saw many kindes of Birds, which washed their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their young.

Alb. Krantius. Rollo his dreame.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dreame, imparted the same vnto his consorts, desiring their iudgements for interpretation; which no way satisfying him, he called a Christian of his English Captiues, a man industrious, and of great capacity, and of whose deepe vnderstanding he had a great opinion: this Captiue then boldened, (and willing in likelihood, to diuert Rollo from infesting England told him, that his dreame was significant and good, and did prognosticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receiue a quiet possession, sion, and a Land of great renowne in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleansed in the Lauer of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy sins of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo well, and he easily beleeued that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therefore prouiding all things for France, hee set his countenance onely that way; yet because he had already performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so faire a Land, intended to sound the King by an Ambassage, that so, if he might finde him inclinable to a league, hee might haue a refuge against future chances; if not, then was he resolute to goe forward with his iourney: therefore making choice of certaine actiue persons, sent them to the English King Alstan, a Prince of a speciall Religion and holinesse of life: these hauing audience, vttered their message as followeth.

Rollo sendeth to sound King Alstan.

(10) Wee being men distressed, and driuen from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed vs, who incouraged vs to seeke and winne a Land by Conquest, supplying vs with strength, and giuing vs great hope of victory: which thing when we resolued to take in hand, a Tempest of weather draue vs (O King) into these English Ports, where staying a fit season to put againe forth, the Winter with-held vs, and our wants made vs to seeke further into the Land: whereupon our men, euermore brought vp to the warre, being euill intreated of those inhabitants, were moued by such iniuries to prouide for their owne defence; wherein some small skirmishes haue passed betwixt them. Our Prince therefore and Generall Rollo, doth humbly require peace of thee, and to be permitted to soiourne in thy Land for a time, and to relieue his company with things necessary, we paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, he shall rest content and pacified, vntill the next spring, at which time he meanes to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenus, not ignorant of the Danish crueltie, and with how great Armies they might oppresse the English shoares, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further courtesie, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not thinke much to repaire to our mansions, for he shall finde none amongst vs but his most loning friends. When this was signified to Rollo, chusing out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisedome, with them he very ioyfully meeteth the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiueth greater: Then sitting down to talke and commune:

Rollo cõmeth to Alstans Court.

(12) I am (saith King Alstenus) right glad, most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowne of your Nation hath beene related to mee, a Martiall kinde of People ye are, and in fight vnconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowesse, are not vnnoted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne vnto vs: It is right pleasing vnto vs to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole Kingdome it before you, choose out a seate for your selfe, and your people whersoeuer you best like, for wee will haue an euerlasting league betweene vs.

Wil. Gemitic. lib. 2. cap. 6. Alstans bounty to Rollo.

(13) Rollo glad of so faire promises, replied: Most worthy and renowned King, I highly esteeme of your bountifull and most liberall proffers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I doe thinke my selfe most bounden and deuoted to your worthinesse; and if destinie euer answere to our desires, wee will not be vnthankefull for this your so great benignitie. To seate our selues in your Kingdome, though indeede wee are very willing, and your Royall proffers doe much more incite vs, yet Fate doth not permit it. I haue determined (and will certainely performe,) to goe into France. For your gifts bestowed on me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to haue a perpetuall League with you, that the like Fortune may betide vs both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. This I both offer, and accept of. This League God grant may to vs both prone happy and fortunate.

(14) With such like interchanges the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, comming forth of their lodgings, most louingly embraced each other, when each gaue and receiued presents best suting with their estates and occasions. Neither doth Krantzius stay his penne there, but proceedeth to particular affayres betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne Writers.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenus their King, taking opportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to be ioyned in a moſt ſtrait confederacy with their Soueraigne) being then imployed in the warres of France, could not come or ſend to his ayde: Alſtenus therefore oppreſſed with a tumultuous Kingdome, remembred Rollo his faithfull friend, and ſending Ambaſſadours declared vnto him what diſtreſſe he was in; who not vnmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French warres, and prepared for England with all his Forces; where entring the Iland, he eaſily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ranſacking their Cities, curbing their wildeneſſe, and ſo reducing them at laſt to an orderly ſubiection. For which his great loue, care, and paines, the King not vnthankfull, reſolued to requite him with the halfe of his Kingdome, appointing the Cities and limiting the bounds, which each of them ſhould rule and gouerne as their owne poſſeſſions.

Alſtans faith to his friend.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as carefull of the peaces continuance, as regardleſſe of ſo great remunerations taketh pledges of the Rebels for ſecuring their loyaltie to the King, and peaceable bearing towards himſelfe, vpō accompliſhment whereof, repairing to Alſtenus he thus beſpake him.

(17) Seeing (King Alſtenus) you haue ſo highly rewarded me, both with princely entertainment, and bountifull preſents, I can doe no leſſe, then willingly beſtow vpon you theſe my paines for your ſafetie: it is no more then your deſerts doe chalenge, neither will I accept, or ſeeme ſo vnconrteous as to expect, for my paines, any part of your Dominion. Your ſelfe now may well gouerne it; for France calls for my preſence: keepe therefore thoſe your Pledges, brought to you by your Subiects, and there is no doubt but you ſhall hence-forward gouerne your Kingdome in a ſetled and contentfull quietneſſe.

(18) The King could not containe thoſe his eyes, which now beheld in a ſtranger ſo ſtrange & vnexempled kindneſſe, from reſoluing into teares; giuing him both hearty thankes, and rich gifts, ſeeing he could not faſten on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rollo deſired was this, that he would giue licence to ſuch voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alſten, ready in all things to gratifie his deſire, gladly condeſcended, and furniſhed him with attendants.

(19) But leauing Krantius the Dane, as likewiſe Gemeticenſis the Norman, to fauour their Country, and theſe their reports to the beſt liking of the judicious; moſt certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gaue the Duchy of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whoſe mother was Æguina, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) vnto Rollo the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuſcript belonging to the Monaſtery of Angiers. And when Rollo was baptized, Charles receiuing him for his God-ſon at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome receiued, and inioyned therein to kiſſe the Kings foot, which he did, but with ſome diſgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not receiue it vpon courteſie.

(20) This Rollo by his ſecond wife Popee, (for Gilla died childleſſe) daughter to the Earle of Beſsin and Baileulx, had a ſonne named William, ſurnamed Long-eſpee, and a daughter called Girlota, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guyan.

(21) William Long-eſpee (ſo called of the Long Sword he vſually wore) the ſecond Daniſh Duke of Normandy, tooke vnto wife Sporta the daughter of Hubert, Earle of Sentlis, by whom he had onely Richard his ſonne: this William receiuing baptiſme, receiued therewith a new name, and was thence-forth called Robert, who hauing gouerned his Dukedome with great moderation the ſpace of twentie yeeres, was guilefully murthered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who ſo farre followed the reuenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Citie Rothomage, and detained him their priſoner, till he agreed to theſe Articles: That young Richard ſhould ſucceed his ſlaine Father in the forefaid Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King & Duke ſhould confer together, the Duke ſhould be girt with his Sword, and the King diſabled either of Sword or Knife: to which Lewes yeelded vpon his corporall oath.

(22) Richard thus eſtabliſhed, gouerned his Dukedome the ſpace of fifty two yeeres. He was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His firſt wife was Agnes*, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbot of Germans, and and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but ſhe dying iſſueleſſe, he ſecondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Daniſh bloud, (whom he had kept his Concubine before) by whom hee had three ſonnes and three daughters: the firſt was Richard that ſucceeded in his dominions; the ſecond was Robert Arch-biſhop of Roan; and the third was called Maliger: his daughters were Hawiſa, the wife of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and mother to Alane and * Guye his ſonnes. Maud eſpouſed * Euldes Earle of Chartiers and Blais: and Emma, called the Flower of Normandy, was Queene of England, both by the Engliſh King Ethelred, and Canutus the Dane, to both which ſhe was married.

Richard 2. the fourth Duke of Normandy. Rand Higden calleth him Richard the third.

(23) Richard the ſecond, ſurnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the ſame for twentie foure yeares: In whoſe time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Siſter making their way: His firſt wife was Iudith the Siſter of Geffrey Earle of Britaigne, by whom he had iſſue, Richard, the fifth Duke of Normandy, and Robert the ſixt, William a Monke, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrewes: his daughters by her were, Alice, that died yong, and another of the ſame name married to Reinold, Earle of Burgoine, and Eleanor eſpouſed to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders, who bare vnto him Baldwin the fifth, father of Maud that was Queen of England, and wife to the Conqueronr.

(24) The ſecond wife to Duke Richard the ſecond, was Eſtrike, Siſter to Canute King of England, from whom he purchaſed a Diuorce, without any iſſue begotten on her body; and then taking for his third wife a faire Gentlewoman named Pauia, had iſſue by her William Earle of Arques, and Mauger Archbiſhop of Roan.

Richard 3. the fifth Duke of Normandy.

(25) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the ſecond yeare of his Dukedome died an vntimely death, not without ſuſpition of Poyſon, miniſtred by Robert his yonger brother, who preſently was inueſted in the Dutchie, for that he left no iſſue of his body to ſucceed.

Robert 2. the ſixt Duke of Normandy.

(26) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimious ſpirit, and of ſuch bounteous liberalitie as is vncredible. He, comming to the Citie Phaleſya in Normandy, chanced to ſee a moſt goodly and beautifull Damoſell, dancing among others of her familiar conſorts; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skinner, ſaith Higden) whoſe pleaſing feature and comely grace ſo pleaſed the Duke, that taking her to his bed, he begot on her, William his onely ſonne, (who prooued the onely man of the Normans bloud) and after vpon a remorſe of conſcience, vndertooke a pilgrimage vnto Ieruſalem, from whence he neuer againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Herlaine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane ſubſtance; to whom ſhee bare Odo Biſhop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent; and Robert created Earle of Mortaigne, a man of a dull and groſſe wit; and a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard Count of Auranches, a Prouince in Normandy,) the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Cheſter. And thus farre briefly I haue thought good to proſecute the Line of the Normans, for the better illuſtration of our Engliſh Stories.

(27) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage vnto the holy land, aſſembled all his Nobilitie vnto the Citie Fiſcan, where he cauſed them to ſweare fealty vnto his ſonne William, being then but ſeauen yeares old, committing him to the Gouernance of one Gilbert, an Earle of much integritie and prudence, and the defence of that Gouernement vnto Henry the French King, and ſo in the eight yeare of his Dukedome, ſet on his voyage for Ieruſalem; who entring Iury, and not able to trauaile, was borne in a Litter vpon the Saracens ſhoulders, and neere vnto the Citie, meeting a returning Pilgrime, deſired him to report in his Country what hee there ſaw, which is, (ſaid hee) that I am carried to Heauen vpon the Diuels backe: but ſo farre was he borne that he neuer returned, being preuented by death: which the Norman Peeres hearing, made vſe thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Pupill and Soueraigne, and growne into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gilbert the Protector was ſlaine, by Randulphus the young Dukes Coſen-Germaine.

(28) The beginner of theſe ſtirres was another of his kinſmen, euen Guy of Burgoine, the ſonne of Duke Richards daughter, brought vp with William in his youth, and euer in his moſt eſpeciall eſteeme; who, vpon a vaine hope to aſpire aſpire to an Earledome, got the ayd of the Vicounts, Nigill, and Randulph, but took ſuch a fall before hee could aſcend the higheſt ſtep, that in loſing his footing he loſt therewith his head.

(29) Strife alſo aroſe betwixt young William, and his vncle William the baſe-borne Earle of Archis. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the eare, fearing ſome hazard to himſelfe, if he ſhould now let him goe, thought it beſt to aide the Earle in his cauſe, and therefore ſent him ſupply vnder the leading of ſome men of note; but William ſo begirt his Caſtle with ſtrait ſiege, that hee cauſed the Earle by famiſhment to yeelde vp his Fort, and droue the French with diſgrace out of the field: where, with ſuch ſucceſſe he ſtill proſpered, that Henry now, to ſecure his owne Confines, ſent Odo his brother for Prefect, into thoſe parts, that lay betwixt the Riuers Rein and the Seyn.

(30) William, as watchfull as the French King was jealous, ſent againſt Odo, Robert Count Aucenſis, Hugh Gornacenſis, Hugh Mountfort, and William Criſpine, all of them ſtout Souldiers, which ſo brauely bare themſelues, that Odo was the firſt man that made away, and the reſt of the French ſaued themſelues by flight.

(31) William that had ſworne a league with King Henry, and in his minority had euer found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that loue and deſerts had obliged him vnto; and therefore by this Stratagem he ſought to diſlodge the French. In the ſilence of night when in the Kings Campe all were at reſt, he cauſed to be cryed aloud, the flight of Odo, and his diſcomfiture, with no leſſe terrour then it was; which rang ſo ſhrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought beſt to be gone: leauing William the abſolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and vprightly gouerned all the dayes of King Henry: whoſe death preſently cauſed an alteration of State; for he leauing Baldwine, ſurnamed the Gentle, and fifth Earle of Flanders, Tutor to his young Sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt thoſe two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one ſide ſo working his Pupill, and on the other the Normane, (who was his ſonne in law) that a moſt firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept vnuiolated ſo long as William was a Duke: where wee will leaue him in proſperitie and peace, and proceede in our intendment, as he did in his Conqueſt here in England.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stopt vp with multitudes of great trees, which by the Policy of Fredericke Abbot of S. Albanes, (a man descended from the Saxons noble bloud, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monastery from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: whereat the Duke both wondring and fretting, sent for the Abbot, vnder his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut; Fredericke answered very stoutly, I haue done (said he) the duty both of my birth and profession; and if others of my ranke had performed the like (as they well might and ought) it had not beene in thy power to haue pierced the Land thus farre.

(5) William hearing the bold answer of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exulcerate the English spirits, gaue way to the present necessitie, and withall hastned (as good policy required) his Coronation, which at Westminster was solemnized vpon Monday, being the day of Christs Natiuity, and yeere of saluation, 1066. where he receiued the Crowne at the hands of Aldred Arch-bishop of Yorke; causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance vnto him; and himselfe likewise at the Altar of S. Peters, tooke a solemne oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good Lawes, and to see justice vprightly administred, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his Councell, such men as hee knew to be of great wisedome and experience: next, applying his thoughts for the securitie of his new gotten Empire; fortified such places as lay open to danger, bestowed strong Garrisons vpon the Coasts, and Shippes to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to inuasion.

When Stigand therefore Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and Egelsine the Politique Abbot of S. Augustines, (being the chiefest Lords and Gouernours of Kent) vnderstood of his approch, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Prouince, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wrongs of the Church; all which now were too apparantly seene: the English till then, (they said) were borne free, and the name of Bond-men not heard of among them; but now seruitude onely attends vs, if wee yeeld (said they) to the insolency of this griping enemy: These two Prelates therefore, after the example of the vndaunted Machabees, offered themselues to die in the defence of their Country; whose forwardnesse drew the people vnto the like resolution, which by their aduertisements were assigned to meete at a day, the place was Swanscombe, two miles West from Graues-end.

(10) Theſe ſtirres in England called William out of Normandy, and were ſo diſtaſtfull to his great, but ill digeſting ſtomacke, that hee began to hold the reine ſtraiter, and harder to curbe the head-ſtrong Engliſh, giuing the poſſeſſions of their Nobles vnto his Normans, and laying vnwonted taxes and heauie Subſidies vpon the Commons, then which nothing bred him more hatred, in ſo much, that many of them, to enioy a barren libertie, forſooke their fruitfull inheritance, and with their wiues and childrē, as outlawes, liued in the woods, preferring that naked name of freedome, before a ſufficient maintenance poſſeſt vnder the thraldome and tyranny of their Conquerours: but in ſhort time, to ſuſtaine their wants, (eaſily conceiued, but hardly endured,) they ſo fell to ſpoyle and robbe, that the high wayes lay vntrodden from Towne to Towne, yea, and priuate houſes euery where ſo guarded with Bowes, Billes, Polaxes, Swords, and Clubs, as if they had beene not harbours of peace, but Fortreſſes of warre; when prayes were made at the ſhutting in, and opening of their doores, as in times of open hoſtilitie. On the other ſide, ſuch as preferred vaſſalage with ſome hope of tollerable, (yea, or vntollerable) vſage; they to curry fauour with the Normans, ſeeming to forget who they were, became as

(11) Vnto theſe Malecontents, and voluntary Out-lawes, ioyned Morcar and Edwine, the ſtout Earles of Cheſter and Yorke-ſhire, ſetting vp againe for their Captaine Edgar Atheling (which if in due time at firſt they had done, might haue proued ſucceſſeful) who with their complices right valiantly for a time reſiſted the Normans, and in their proceedings put many of them to the ſword. King William as carefull and ſedulous to preuent further miſchiefe, collecting his Forces, and not without danger of his life, diſſolued their power, ſo that euery man ſought how to ſaue himſelfe by eſcape: among whom Edwin and Morcar, Weltherſus and Merther, with ſome of the Biſhops and Clergie, went into Scotland: Marleſwin, and Goſpatricke, Noblemen of Northumberland went into Denmarke: Edgar Atheling, with his mother Agatha, and his ſiſters Chriſtian and Margaret, tooke the Seas for Hungarie; but by contrary windes were driuen into Scotland, where they were moſt courteouſly entertained by Malcolme (ſurnamed Cammor) King of that Country, who ſo affected the perſon and qualities of Lady Margaret, that hee entred with her a Nuptiall contract, and the rather in reſpect of her poſſibilitie and neereneſſe to the Engliſh Crowne; whoſe marriage was ſolemnized about the feaſt of Eaſter, in the ſecond of King Williams raigne, whereby Scotland became a ſanctuary to the Engliſh, which daily fled thither from the preſſures of the Normans.

But Malcolme minding more his owne honour, then King Williams threats, returned this anſwer, That he held it an vniuſt thing, yea, and (in a Prince) a wicked part, to betray him to his enemy, that came vnto his Court for protection, as Prince Edgar was forced for feare of his life; whoſe innocency and demeanour toward William, his greateſt aduerſary could not touch with the leaſt ſuſpect: alledging further (beſides the reſpect of ordinary humanity, in this caſe euer religiouſly to be obſerued) the ſtraight bands of their neere alliance, which required him to tender the afflicted eſtate of his moſt louing wiues, moſt loued brother, comming vnder his Canopie, as it were for defence.

An honourable ſaying.

The loue of alliance.

(13) William thus fruſtrate of all hope from King Malcolme, & daily perplexed at the flight of the Engliſh vnto his Kingdome, feared a reuolt and dangerous rebellion; to preuent which, he cauſed foure ſtrong Caſtles to be built, one at Haſting, another at Lincolne, the third at Nottingham, & the fourth at Yorke, wherein he beſtowed ſtrong garriſons: and diſarming the Engliſh of armour, cõmanded euery houſe-holder to put out both fire and candle at eight of the clock at night; at which houre, in euery Citie, Towne, and Village, he cauſed a Bell to be rung, of the French then called Couerfew (that is, Couer-fire) partly yet in practiſe, and in name very neere, commonly called Curfue: to preuent nightly tumults that might happily be done.

Fire and Candle forbad at certain houres vnto the Engliſh.

(14) All this his circumſpection notwithſtanding, could not preuent the troubles that preſently aroſe; for Goodwin and Edmund, the ſonnes of the late King Harold, comming with ſome Forces out of Ireland, and landing in Somerſetſhire, fought with Aduothus, (ſometime Maſter of their Fathers horſe, but now a Normaniſt) whom they ſlew with many others, and taking great booties both in Cornwall and Deuon-ſhire, departed againe for Ireland.

The chiefe inſtigator to their diſloyalty was Citha the mother of King Harold, and ſiſter to Swaine King of Denmarke, with others ſiding againſt the Normans, who now ſeeing the yeelding vp of that Citie, ſhifted themſelues out of danger, and

An.D.1068 (15) But fortune to Cumin was not ſo fauourable in the North, nor himſelfe ſo circumſpect as valiant; for lying ſecurely, as he thought in the Citie of Durham, he was on the ſodaine ſurpriſed in the night by Edgar Atheling & his followers, where Robert and ſeauen hundred of his Normans were ſlaine, one onely eſcaping, who brought the bloudy newes therof to King William, which happened in the third of his raigne, the twenty eight of Ianuary, and yeare of Chriſt 1068. The depth of Winter notwithſtanding, he poſted into the North; whoſe onely terrour daunted all further attempts, ſo that taking ſome of the Authors of this rebellion, he cut off their hands, and ſome their heads, conceiuing hereupon more hatred againſt the Engliſh, and in that ſpleene of diſpleaſure returned to London.

(20) The ancient Lawes of the Land he abrogated for the moſt part, ordaining new, nothing ſo equall nor ſo eaſie to be kept; which his Lawes although they neerely concerned the Engliſh, and therefore ought of them to haue beene familiarly knowne, were notwithſtanding written in the harſh Norman tongue, which they vnderſtood not; ſo that many perſons, partly by the iniquity of the Law it ſelfe, partly by ignorance in miſconſtruction, and often alſo by the ſleights of Pleaders and Iudges, who might pretend for Law what they liſt, were wrongfully condemned, in forfeiture of Goods, Lands, yea, and alſo of Life, & generally ſo intangled with their vnknowne interpretation, and tortured with their delayes, turmoyles, and trauerſes, that they rather choſe to giue ouer their ſuits, then to follow them with their endleſſe vexations.

Hee cauſed likewiſe his Broad-Seale, wherewith he confirmed his Deedes and Charters, to be inſcribed on the one ſide, to acknowledge him for the Normans Patron, and on the other, for the Engliſh King, as in the ſculpture thereof, at the entrance of his Hiſtory is ſeene, which beareth this ſence;

(21) Theſe ſnares of his Lawes, accounted the fetters of the Natiues, were by the Nobilitie ſought to be caſt off: for Edwin and Morcar, (the two ſtout Earles ſo often mentioned) fainedly reconciled to the King not long before, combining with Fretherike, the bold and rich Abbot of S. Albanes, ſet vp Edgar Atheling their Generall once againe, and fell into a new conſpiracy: William, Lyon-like, ſtorming at the looſe and regardleſſe allegiance of theſe vnſufferable ſubiects, daily with freſh attempts ſo diſturbing his peace, with a mightie power haſtened againſt them, and armed as well with the ſpirituall ſword of Lanfranck, (then aduanced to bee Archbiſhop of Canterbury) as with maile of Iron, or coats of ſteele, laid all barren whereſoeuer he came: his oppoſites for their parts knowing his purpoſe, as deſperately maintained what they had begun, and fully were reſolued to make the ſword their Iudge.

(22) The King by his Spials hearing the encreaſe of their power, and knowing, to his reſtleſſe trouble, the vnwilling ſubiection of the Engliſh, entred conſultation with his Arch-biſhop; who as Rhehoboams Sages, gaue him counſell ſomewhat to beare with their abuſes, rather then to hazard the ruine of all in fight; and ſo farre preuailed in this his aduice, that an aſſembly was appointed to meete at Berkhamſted in the County of Hertford, where the King entring parley with the Engliſh Nobilitie, ſo farre did winde himſelfe into their good opinions, (being a very politicke, and faire-ſpoken Prince) that they all forthwith laid downe their weapons.

(24) Peace thus eſtabliſhed, among other cõferences beſeeming ſuch eſtates, it chanced King William to demand the reaſon how it came to paſſe, that his fortune ſhould be in one dayes battaile to ſubdue the Engliſh, which the Danes before him could not doe in many; to which queſtion whilſt each ſtood looking on others, expecting what to anſwer, the ſtout Abbot Frethericke ſtept forth and ſaid:

(25) The reaſon thereof may eaſily bee giuen, if the occaſion bee well weighed; for wontedly the Land was defended by dint of Swords, vntill that their warlike wearers vpon their godly deuotions, laid them from their ſides vpon the Altars of Oriſons, which through ouer-long reſt are growne very ruſty, and their edges too dull now for the field; for, (ſayd he) the maintenance of martiall men, with a great part of this Lands reuenewes, are daily conuerted to pious imployments, to maintaine and defend theſe holy Votaries, whoſe prayers pierce more deeper then the Sword: and therefore thou art obliged O King to maintaine their peace, that haue beene the cauſe of thy ſo eaſie purchaſe.

(26) But William before the words were well out of his mouth, replyed and ſaid, Is the Clergy ſo rich, & ſo ſtrengthned, that the Land thereby lieth weakened of her men at Armes, and to keepe onely the religious in ſafety, ſhall the Laity lie expoſed to the inuaſions of the Danes, and other forreine enemies? ſurely out of your owne mouthes I will judge you, and for redreſſe will firſt begin with thee: whereupon he tooke from the Abbey of Saint Albanes all the lands and reuenewes that lay betwixt Barnet and London-Stone. Abbot Frethericke, whoſe ouer-bold anſweres had now offended the King, without delay called a chapter of his brethren, ſhewing them their approching dangers, and to auoyd the preſent ſtorme, went himſelfe to Ely, where he deſiſted not from his wonted machinations againſt the Conquerour.

(26) This conference ended, and the Kings oath receiued, the Engliſh Armies disband themſelues, as dreaming they had now good-Fortune by the foot, and hoping the greateſt ſtormes of their dangers were paſt; which preſently proued but a vaine ſurmiſe: for King William hauing compounded with the Danes that lay all this laſt Winter in Northumberland, and payed them a great ſumme for their departure, beganne extreamely to hate the Rebels, and with full reſolution of their deſtruction, ſuddainely ſet vpon them apart; which he durſt not attempt when they were vnited, ſo that ſlaying many, impriſoning others, and proſecuting all of them with fire and ſword, well was hee that could be firſt gone.

(30) Howſoeuer the Monkes of Ely kept their promiſe with William for betraying of the Ile; hee contrariwiſe brake his for their preſeruation and peace; for by no meanes their prayers would enter his eares, till the ſound of ſeauen hundred markes had opened the way; to collect which, they were forced to ſell both the jewels and ornaments of their Church; which being brought to his receiuers, there wanted (whether by error or deceit) a groat in weight, (for in thoſe dayes greater ſummes paſſed by weight, not by tale,) whereof when the King vnderſtood, hee in great (but captious) rage, denied them all compoſition for peace, whereupon with much ſuite hee was entreated to accept of a thouſand markes more, to raiſe which, they diſfurniſhed their Monaſtery euen of things of neceſſary vſe.

The Conquerour, therefore not a little moued againſt King Malcolme for that his Country was a receptacle of his Rebellious Subjects, and himſelfe now the chiefe Leader of the Male-contents into his Kingdome, haſted into Scotland, with a deſire and purpoſe to haue done much more then hee was able to accompliſh: for entring Galloway he more wearied his Souldiers in paſſing the Mariſh grounds and

(32) But Malcolme wiſely conſidering the euent of warre, and that the occaſion thereof was not for his owne ſubiects, but for a ſort of forraine fugitiues, began to thinke, that the wrongs therein done to another hee could hardly brooke himſelfe, and ſent therefore to William proffers of peace; whereunto laſtly the Engliſh King inclined, and hoſtages deliuered vpon further Conferences, what time (as I take it) vpon Stane-more, not far from an homely hoſtilerie called the Spittle, a Stone-Croſſe (on the one ſide of whoſe ſhaft ſtood the picture, and armes of the King of England, and on the other the Image and armes of the King and Kingdome of Scotland, vpon that occaſion called the * Roi-croſſe) was erected, to ſhew the Limits of either Kingdome; ſome ruines of which Meere-marke are yet appearing; for King William, granting Cumberland vnto Malcolme, to hold the ſame from him, conditionally that the Scots ſhould not attempt any thing preiudiciall to the Crowne of England (for which King Malcolme did him homage, ſaith Hector Boetius the Scottiſh Writer) and the Engliſh being reconciled to his fauour, after hee had built the Caſtle of Durham, returned as cleared from all Northern troubles.

(40) King William hearing of his ſonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great cauſe there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerfull Army haſted to Normandy: where neere vnto the Caſtle of Gerbory, at a place called Archenbraye, he joyned battle with his ſonne; where the fight was ſore and dangerous on both ſides, the Generals being ſuch men as they were: but in the heat of the foot battles that fought it out reſolutely, Robert commanded a power of Horſe to breake in vpon the Rereward of his enemies, and himſelfe valiantly following, chanced to light againſt his owne Father, and with his Lance thruſt him through the Arme, bearing him off his Horſe to the ground. King William thus wounded and ſaine, called for helpe to be remounted, ſtorming to ſee his bloud ſpilt in his owne Land, and againſt his owne ſonne, which neuer had beene in battailes of other Countries, nor drawne by the weapons of forraigne enemies, and in great rage threatned the reuenge: Robert, that knew his Father by his voice, haſtily alighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly deſiring his pardon for this vnknowne fact, and forgiueneſſe of his ouer-haſtie attempt; then mounting him vpon his owne Horſe, brought him in ſafetie out of the preſſe; who hauing eſcaped ſo great a danger, and ſeeing himſelfe for the preſent too weake to withſtand the enemy, left the honour of the field vnto Robert, with the loſſe of many his ſouldiers, ſlaine there both in the battaile and chaſe, beſides a great number that were hurt and wounded; among whom, William Rufus his ſecond ſonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filiall regard to his parents, and therefore more deſeruedly and tenderly beloued then Robert; for which diſhonour now done to his Father, and diſloyaltie for his vnnaturall Armes, he bitterly curſed him, and execrated the time wherein he begat him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his moſt vndaunted courage at that time, iſſuing and ending in ſuch dutifull and tender care of his Fathers ſafetie, he preſently forgaue his former offences, and euer after had him in better reſpect.

Raigne a moſt fearefull Earth-quake, with a warring noiſe, did ſhake the ground.

Calamities falling on the Land.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to haue hapned vpon his people, as burning feuers, ſtrangely conſuming the people: Murrens deuouring infinite numbers of Cattle; abundance of raine, and concourſe of water-flouds beyond credite, whereby the Hilles were ſo ſoftned to the very foundations, that ſome of them fell, and ouerwhelmed the Villages which were in their way: moſt of the principall Cities of England much endammaged by fire, and London eſpecially, where the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combuſtible) was conſumed to aſhes; and if that may alſo be noted (which cauſed not the leaſt wonder) tame, and domeſticke fowles, as Hennes, Geeſe, Peacockes, and the like, fled into the Forreſts, and Woods, and became very wilde, in imitation of men, degenerating then into ſauages: for in thoſe times euen the Church-men (and therefore leſſe maruaile of others) became vnlike themſelues: Walter Biſhop of Durham, bought of King William the Earledome of Northumberland, maintained Murtherers, & was murthered himſelfe. Odo, another Biſhop, and Earle alſo, to reuenge his death, made Northumberland deſolate, beheading and diſmembring the poorer ſort, and at great ranſomes fining the rich. And Pope Gregory for his part played Rex in this Land, ſending hither his Buls with damning Curſes againſt the married Clergie: commanding that none ſhould heare their Maſſes: which how it was diſgeſted, either by God, or man, let vs heare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) ſpeake his minde.

All things degenerate.

King William hearing thereof, is ſaid to make this anſwere; Well, our Coſen of France I truſt ſhall be at no ſuch coſt; but after this my Child-birth, at my going to Church (ſwearing by the reſurrection and brightneſſe of God,) I will (ſaid he) finde him one thouſand Candles, and light them my ſelfe. And accordingly towards Auguſt following, when both the Trees, Fruites, Corne, and Ground, was moſt flouriſhing, hee entred France with a mightie Army, ſpoyling all the Weſt parts thereof before him; and laſtly, ſet the Citie Meux or Maunte on fire, wherein hee conſumed the faire Church of our Lady, in the walles whereof was encloſed an Anchoret, who might, but would not eſcape, holding it a breach of his Religious vow to forſake his Cell in that diſtreſſe. The King buſied in theſe attempts, cheared his men to feede the fire, and came himſelfe ſo neere the flames, that with the heate of his harneſſe, he got a ſickneſſe, and the ſame encreaſed by the leape of his Horſe, that burſt the inward rimme of his belly, and coſt him his life.

But what shall I doe with Treasure*, said Henry, if I shall haue no dwelling place or habitation? King William Legacy to his sonne Henry. His Father replied, Bee patient my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, suffer quietly thy elder brother to goe before thee: Robert shall haue Normandy, and William England: but thou in time shalt intirely haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt extell thy Brethren in riches and power.

After which speeches, he presently called his sonne William, to whom he deliuered a letter signed with his own Seale, written vnto Lanfranck Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and commanded him therewith to hast for England, least in that spatious Kingdome some suddaine troubles should arise; and so with a Kisse blessed him in Christ. His prisoners hee commanded to be set at libertie, affirming that hee had done Earle Morcar much wrong, whom as he then confessed, he had imprisoned more for feare then for fault; onely his halfe-brother Odo he would haue had to remaine a perpetuall prisoner, but that by the importunate interceſſion of friends he was released. He writeth into England.

(56) The period of this Great Conquerour now come neere to his last, when this Sunne, so gloriously raised to the height of his course, must now of force set in the West, the dying King (for Kings must die) hauing raised his weake body vpon the Pillowes, heard the sound of the great Bell in the Metropolitane Church of Saint Gernis neere Roan, and demanding the cause, one replied that it did then ring prime to our Lady; whereupon with great deuotion lifting his eyes towards heauen, and spreading abroad his hands; I commend my selfe (said he) to that blessed Lady, Mary, Mother of God, that shee by her holy prayers may reconcile mee to her most deare Sonne, our Lord Iesus Christ; and with the words yeelded vp his Ghost, vpon Thursday the ninth of September, the fifty sixth of his Dutchy, the twenty one of his Kingdome, the sixtie foure of his age, and yeare of Christ Iesus 1087. King Williams death.

(57) Wherein; as wee see the instabilitie, both of Mans life, and Glory, (a poynt fitting for great Princes euer to thinke on;) so by the sequell we shall perceiue, how ill-rooted and vngrounded the friendship is, which attẽds the greatnesse of Soueraignes, whose Fauourites chiefe or only ends are their own Ambition and Gaine, the fewell whereof once beginning to decay, the fire of their seeming-deuotion will be quickly cold. For no sooner had this late-glorious Princes Soule bidden farewell to his Body, but his With such doctrine was good deuotiõ abused, contrary to the prescript of God, Isai. Chap. 33.16. Princes friends.

His Corpse forsaken of all sorts.

his dead Corps was presently abandoned by his followers of neerest place, & best meanes, who posted homewards apace to defend their owne; and by the meaner and his inferiour seruants, he was dispoyled of Armour, Vessels, Apparell, and all Princely furniture, euen so farre from all wonted and due respect, as that they left his dead body naked vpon the floore; like true Kites, preying whilest any thing was to be had.

The qualities of Court-Kites.

The sodaine fame of his death strucke such feare into the Commons hearts as was admirable, euery man shifting for one, but all neglecting the funerall rites of their King, vntill that one Harluins a poore Country Knight, vndertooke the Carriage of his Corpse vnto Cane, and at his owne cost, both by Sea and Land vnto Saint Stephens Church, which this dead King had formerly founded.

His Hearse also abandoned of all.

At his entrance into Cane, the Couent of Monkes came forth to meet him, and to celebrate the buriall with all ceremonies beseeming; but behold euen at that instant, a sudden chance of fire happened which presently inuaded a great part of the Towne, that, as his Corpse before, so now his Hearse was of all forsaken, whiles they addressed themselues to represse that furious Element: which done, and the Funerall-Sermon ended, the Stone-Coffin set in the earth, in the Chancell betwixt the Chorale and the Altar, and the body ready to be laid therein, one Ascelinus Fitz-Arthur, a man of some Note, stood vp and forbad the buriall: This very place (said he) was the floore of my Fathers house, which this dead Duke violently tooke from him, and here vpon part of my inheritance founded this Church: This ground therefore I challenge, and in Gods behalfe, forbid that the Body of my dispoiler, be couered in my Earth, neither shall it be interred in the precincts of my right. Whereupon they were enforced to compound with him for a present summe of money then deliuered, and with consent of his sonne Henry, for a hundred pound weight of siluer, after to be paid, and so the Exequies went forward; when, behold againe the Corpse laid into the Tombe, was with the largest, which being pressed, the belly (not bowelled) brake, and with an intollerable stench so annoyed the by-standers, that neither Gummes, nor Spices, fuming from the Censures, could be any whit sensible to relieue them, insomuch that all with great amazement hastning away, they left the Monks to shuffle vp the buriall, and they were soone glad to get them to their Cels.

His buriall place denied him.

Annoyance at his Funerall. Hence Stowe notes their report for fabulous, who wrote that his Body was found vncorrupt 500. yeares after his death.

(58) This then was the life and death of this great Monarch, the Conquerour of Men, but not of Death, nor suruiuing Enuie; a bright example of the dimme glory of Man, who in life had the possessions of Kingdomes and Dukedomes, men at Armes, riches, and honour, and all things thereto adhering; but after his death, neither Ornaments, nor Attendants, nor place of buriall, till it were bought; all which, priuate men seldome want: so vaine is the pompe of this world, and so vncertaine the state of her darlings.

His descriptiō for lineamēts and qualities. Will. Malmesb.

(59) He was of stature indifferent, of countenance sterne, his fore-head high, and haire very thinne, fat and corpulent of body, with his belly bearing out, so strong of joynts and armes, that few could bend his Bow; of wit ready, and very politique, in speech eloquent, resolute in attempts, in hazards valiant, a great Souldier, and as great in successe; rough & couetous towards the English, in his taxes, lawes, and in giuing to his Normans their lands; whose Charters were of a farre other tenour, forme, and breuitie, then those tedious and perplexed conueyances, since in vse, as by these few inserted may appeare:

(61) In the like Charter, granted to his Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine for Lands in Yorkeſhire, he writeth himſelfe William ſurnamed Baſtard; and yet it ſeemeth, hee was offended at Guy of Burgundy for tearming him Nothus; perhaps, becauſe that word ſignifieth ſuch a one, whoſe Father is vnknowne, whereas King VVilliams was not onely knowne, but renowned alſo.

Will. Malm.

(62) Howſoeuer he was ſterne and hard to the Engliſh, yet to his Normans hee was facile and too indulgent, much deuoted to religion, and frequenting the Church, both morning and euening; the Clergie that liued according to their rule and profeſſion, hee both honoured and richly endowed; but to the licentious was very rough and hard-handed: his Vncle Malgerius, Archbiſhop of Rotomage: for his diſſolute life hee diſgraded: his brother Odo Biſhop of Baieux he impriſoned, and many of the Engliſh depriued, as we haue heard.

(64) But moſt certaine it is, that in the very ſame place where King Harolds Standard was pitched, and vnder which himſelf was ſlain, there William the Conquerour laid that foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Martin that ther the Monks might pray for the ſoules of Harold and the reſt that were ſlaine in that place; whoſe priuiledges were ſo larg that they, and others of the like condition, were afterwards diſſolued by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of puniſhment being once taken away; deſperate boldneſſe, & a daring wil to commit wickednes, grew ſtill to a greater head: for it was enfranchiſed with many freedoms, and among others, to vſe the words of the Charter, were theſe: If any Thiefe, Murtherer or Felon, for feare of death, flie and come to this Church, let him haue no harm, but let him be diſmiſſed, and ſent away free from all puniſhment. Be it lawfull alſo for the Abbot of the ſame Church to deliuer from the Gallows any thiefe or robber wherſoeuer, if he chance to come by, wher any ſuch execution is in hand.

His Wife.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldwine the fifth, ſurnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flaunders; her mother was Alice, daughter of Robert King of France, the ſonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married vnto him when he was a Duke, at the Caſtle of Angi in Normandy, and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne ouer England, ſhee was crowned Queene vpon whit-ſunday, the yeere of Grace, 1068. And although ſhee maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and our of her owne coffers payd the charges of warre againſt his Father, and her owne Husband: yet, becauſe it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for aduaucing her ſonne, it was taken as a cauſe rather of diſpleaſure, then of hatred, by King william, as himſelfe would often auouch, holding it an inſufficient cauſe to diminiſh the loue, that was linked with the ſacred band of a matrimoniall knot. She departed this life the ſecond day of Nouember, the ſixteenth yere of his raigne, and of Chriſts humanity, 1083. for whom he often lamented with teares, and moſt honorably enterred her at Cane in Normandy, in the Church of S. Maries, within the Monaſtery of Nunnes which ſhe had there founded.

(68) Robert, the eldeſt ſonne of King William, and of Queene Maude his wife, was ſurnamed Curtuoiſe, ſignifying in the old Norman French, Short-Bootes: he ſucceeded his father onely in the Dutchy of Normandy, and that alſo he loſt afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battle of Ednarchbray (in that Dukedome) the yere of our Lord 1106. where he was taken priſoner, and hauing his eyes put out (an vnbrotherly puniſhment) was committed to the Caſtle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeeres impriſonment, there deceaſed, the yeer before the death of his fayd brother, Anno 1134. and was buried at Glouceſter, in the midſt of the Quier of Saint Peters Church; where remaineth a Tombe with his Carued Image at this day. He had two wiues, the firſt, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Maygne, both married in their Child-hood, and ſhee dyed before they came to yeeres of conſent: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Geffrey, and ſiſter to William Earles of Conuerſana in Italy, and Neece of Robert Guiſcard, Duke of Apulia. By her he had two ſonnes William and Henry; this Henry was hee that was ſlaine by miſchance, as hee was hunting in the New-Forreſt in Hampſhire.

(69) Richard, the ſecond ſonne of King William and Queene Maude, was born in Normandy, and after his Father had attained the Crowne, came into England, where, being then very young, as he was hunting in the New-Forreſt of Hampſhire, he came to a violent & ſudden death, by the goring of a Stagge; (others ſay, by a peſtilent ayre, and is noted to be the firſt man that died in that place, the iuſtice of God puniſhing on him his Fathers diſpeopling of that Country: his body was thence conueyed to Wincheſter and there buried on the Southſide of the Quire of the Cathedrall Church, where there remaineth a monument of him with an inſcription entitling him a Duke, and ſome ſuppoſe of Boloigne.

William Rufus, or the Redde.

(70) William, the third Son of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, in the 21. yeere of his Fathers Dukedome, ten yeeres before hee was King, 1059. hee was ſurnamed of the Red colour of his haire, in French Rows, in Latine Rufus; he was brought vp vnder Lanfrank the learned Lumbard, who was Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, of whom hee receiued both inſtructions of knowledge, and the order of Knighthood; he ſerued vnder his Father at the battaile of Gerberoth, in Normandy, 1079. wherein he was wounded: and hee alwayes framed his actions ſo pleaſing to his Fathers humour, as that hee thought him much worthier then his elder brother to ſucceede in his Kingdome.

Henry Beauclerke.

(71) Henry, the fourth and youngeſt ſonne of king VVilliam and Queen Maud his wife, was borne in England at Selby in Yorkeſhire, the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of our Lord God, 1070. his childhood was trained vp in learning at Cambridge, ſayth Caius; but the ancient Annales of Saint Auſtins in Canterbury, ſay, hee was Philoſophiâ peregrè informatus, inſtructed beyond Sea in Philoſophy; where for his notable knowledge in the Liberall Sciences, hee was ſurnamed by the French, Beau-clerk, that is, the fine Scholler. Vpon his return he was made Knight, being 16. yeres old, by his Father at Weſtminſter in Whitſontide, the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, Anno 1086. and though at his Fathers death he had nothing bequeathed him but Treaſure, yet afterward he ſucceeded his Brothers, both in the Kingdome of England and Dutchie of Normandy.

Cicelie.

(72) Cicelie, the Eldeſt daughter of King VVilliam and Queene Maude his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought vp in England, and carried againe into Normandy, where in the ninth yeere of the Kings raigne, and the yeere of our Lord 1075. ſhe was by her Father on Eaſter day, with great ſolemnity offered vp in the Church of Feſchampe, and vailed to bee a Nunne in the Monaſtery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnes of our Lady at Cane, to be Abbeſſe of their Monaſtery, founded by her Mother, which ſhe gouerned, and where ſhe dyed and was enterred.

She is vailed a Nunne.

Conſtance.

(73) Conſtance, the ſecond daughter of King VVilliam and Queene Maude, was the firſt wife of Allayn Earle of little Britaigne, ſurnamed in the Britiſh, Fergent; in Engliſh, Red. In regard of which marriage, and his ſeruice done at the conqueſt of England, his Father in law gaue him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Caſtle, and whereof he made the Earledome of Richmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Succeſſors; although he had his children by another wife; for ſhe dyed very young and without Iſſue; and was buryed in the Abbey of S. Edmundſbury in Suffolke.

Gundred.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King VVilliam, and of Queene Maud, was married to VVilliam of VVarrein, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the firſt Earle of Surrey in England; by whom ſhe had iſſue VVilliam the ſecond Earle, Progenitors of the Earles that followed; and Rainold of VVarrein, her ſecond ſonne, who had alſo Iſſue. Shee dyed in Child-bed, three yeeres before her husband, at Caſtleaker in Norfolke the 27. of May, in the 20. yeere of her Fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord, 1085. and is buryed in the Chapterhouſe of Saint Pancraſe Church within the Priory, at the towne of Lewes in the County of Suſſex.

Ela.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King VVilliam, and his Queene Maud, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harold, when hee was in Normandy, being then a young Widower. Notwithſtanding, he refuſing her, tooke another wife, and vſurped the Kingdome of England, after the death of King Edward, whereby hee occaſioned his own ruine, and conqueſt of his Country, which afterward enſued when her father ſought reuenge, ſo much (as ſome write) to the diſcontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of theſe miſchances, ſhee euer after refuſed marriage, and led a ſingle and ſolitarie life; though others upon better warrant collect, that ſhee dyed young, and before VVilliam her Father ſet forth for England: Harold himſelfe pleading that hee was free from all couenants and promiſes to Duke VVilliam, by reaſon of the death of this his daughter.

Margaret, (77) Margaret, the ſixth and yongeſt daughter of King VVilliam and Queene Maud, was in her childhood giuen in marriage to Alphonſo King of Gallicia in Spaine, that afterward was ſo renowned for the Conqueſt of the City Lyſbon, for his victories againſt the Mores, and for the ſlaughter of their fiue Kings, and was the founder of the Kingdome of Portugall, the firſt King thereof, and the firſt bearer of the fiue Shields of the ſaid fiue Kings, which are to this day the Armes of the ſame. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceaſed before thoſe things hapned, and before ſhe came 10 yeeres of lawful conſent to the marriage.

VVILLIAM THE SECOND, SVRNAMED RVFVS, THE FORTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH: HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, AND VNTIMELY DEATH.

Monarc. 40.

CHAPTER III.

An. D. 1087 William Rufus comes into England.

William posting for England, & Archbishop Lanfrank his earnest soliciter, by liberall gifts giuen & promises made to abrogate the ouer-hard Lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of thē that could do most: and the more to notifie his intended milde gouernement, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his fauours towards the English, he brought with him from Normandy Morcar, the stout Earle of Chester, and Wilnoth the sonne of King Harold, both of them released out of prison, and then held in speciall fauour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curtoise his elder Brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subjects) their titles had beene tryed by swords, had not Lanfrank and Wulstan, both wise and reuerend Prelates, by their Counsels and Mediations stayed their hands.

Lanfranke and Wulstane sway the Peeres for Rufus.

(2) Consent thus gotten, and all voyces giuen for William, hee was crowned their King at Westminster, vpon Sunday the tewenty sixt day of September, and yeere of Saluation, 1087. by the hands of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury; vnder whom hee had beene educated euen from his Childe-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Gouernment, had not the variable inclination of his owne mind carryed his actions past the limits of any stayed compasse.

His dispositiõ.

A. D. 1088. Rand. Higden. in Polychr. Ly. c. 5. Robert possessed of Normandy.

(3) Robert vpon discontents that Normandy was still detained, before his Fathers sicknesse, was gone into Germany, to solicite their assistance for his right to that Duchie: but hearing of his death, hasteth into the Prouince, and was there peaceably receiued, and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding, seemed to him dishonourable; his yonger brother being inuested to a Kingdome, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause mouing, but his ouer-much gentlenesse, being by nature composed nothing so rough, as was Rufus.

Odoes emulation against Lanfranke.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishop of Bayeux (his vncle) against Lanfrank the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of fauour with the Conquerour his halfe-brother, whom hee taught the distinction of imprisoning Odo, as an Earle, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a just reuenge: and albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where he had beene captiuated, and restored him his honours & dignities in England; yet he, vngratefull man, enuying that Lanfrank should goe before him, complotted the downefall aswel of the one as of the other. And drawing into this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his Letters into Normandy vnto his Nephew, hasting him to repayre into England, and recouer his right, which by his meanes he promised should soone be effected.

Polyc. lib. 7. cap. 5.

He conspireth against the King.

Inuiteth Robert to try for the Crowne.

(5) The busines thus wrought to Duke Roberts hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy succesle, onely the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, haning euer borne himselfe no lesse then his birth, nor euer had made his bags his summum bonum. In these extreames, hee well saw the lesse was to be followed, and to set a Dukedome at stake to cast at a Kingdome, hee thought it ods sufficient, though the chance were doubtfull: Therefore to his yonger brother Henry, who had store of Gold, and wanted Land, hee morgaged the Countie of Constantine, a Prouince in Normandy, and then sent to Odo, that hee should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

Duke Roberts hopes for England.

(6) The Bishop now growne bold vpon Duke Roberts great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, sending to his complices abroad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert de Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geffrey Bishop of Constance, sacked Bath, and Berkley, with a great part of Wiltshire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Bristow against King William: In Norfolke, Roger By-god, in Leicestershire Hugh Grentemeisnil did shrewdly waste those Countries: Roger Mountgomery Earle of Shrewsburie with his Welshmen, assisted by William Bishop of Durham (the Kings domesticall Chaplaine) Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer (all of them Normans or French-men) with fire and sword past through the Country of Worcester: and surely the stirres were so great, and Duke Robert so fauoured, that by the judgement of Gemeticensis, had he hasted his arriuage, or followed the occasion, the Crowne of England had easily beene set vpon his head.

(7) All in an vprore, and Rufus thus turmoiled, hee appointed his Nauie to scowre the seas, and to impeach his brothers arriuage: then gathering his forces, and knowing well how to please the vulgar, promiseth againe to abolish their ouer-hard lawes, and presently to put downe all vnjust Imposts and Taxations, whereby the People were soone drawne to stand in his defence; and among them Roger Mountgomery was reconciled reconciled to the King.

Thus now growne ſtrong, and his enemies decreaſed, he led his Army into Kent, where the ſedition firſt beganne; the Caſtles of Tunbridge and Horne hee recouered, as likewiſe Pemſey, wherein his vncle Odo had ſtrongly immured him ſelfe, whoſe lacke of victuall, by King Williams ſtrait ſiege, allayed the pride of that great-hearted man; ſo that hee not onely ſurrendred the ſame, but promiſed the deliuery of Rocheſter alſo, ſtrongly manned, with Euſtace Earle of Boloigne, and a ſort of other gallant Gentlemen, euen the flower of Normandy & Flanders.

(8) Odo comming to Rocheſter for the deliuery of the *Caſtle, according to his promiſe, was by them ſurprized, and layd in ſtrait priſon, whether in diſpleaſure, or vnder colour, and with conſent of Odo, I will not ſay; but certaine it is, that the King tooke the matter ſo to heart, that he ſent forth his Proclamation through England, commanding that euery man ſhould repaire to that ſiege, whoſoeuer would not be reputed a Niding, a word of ſuch diſgrace, and ſo diſtaſtiue vnto the Engliſh, that multitudes ſeemed rather to flie, then runne to that ſeruice; whereupon the Caſtle was ſurrendred, and Odo baniſhed into Normandy, loſt all his liuings and honours in England.

(9) Whileſt theſe things were in acting betwixt King William and his Barons, Duke Robert with his Normans was landed at Southampton, hauing paſſed ſome conflict with the Kings ſhips at the ſea: whom Rufus ſo feared (if mine Author ſay true) that he ſent Meſſengers vnto him in moſt ſubmiſſiue manner, proteſting that he tooke not the Crowne as his owne, by any right; but rather to ſupply the time in his abſence: neither did hee account himſelfe King, but as his ſubſtitute to hold the Crown vnder him; yet ſeeing the matter had beene ſo farre paſſed, and the Emperiall Crowne ſet on his head; hee moſt humbly deſired that it might ſo reſt, proffering to pay him three thouſand Marks by yeer, and to reſigne it to him at his death: whereat Duke Robert ſhaking his head (belike he ſaw no other remedy) eaſily conſented, and returned forthwith into Normandy.

(10) And, if wee compare this with the Monke of Saint Albans report, wee may well beleeue, that William was forward enough in his offers, though euer as vnready in performance; for the Barons then being vp, and hee not able to allay them, did that by his word, which he could not by his ſword, proteſting to them that hee was willing to reſigne the Kingdome, and would be content either with Money or poſſeſſions, if thoſe that were his Fathers Ouer-ſeers, ſhould thinke it meete; and for any Ordinances touching the affaires of the Common-weale, hee would referre it wholly to themſelues, prouided alwaies his own honour ſhould not thereby bee impeached. But when the Cloudes of theſe feares were altogether ouerblowne, no budde once appeared from theſe faire planted grafts.

Faire words appeaſe fooles and often deceiue the wiſe.

(11) For Lanfranke deceaſed, and both King deprined of a politicke director, & Common-wealth of a principall Statiſt, hee preſently ſhewed the bent of his inclination, lauiſhly giuing where no deſerts had engaged, and exacting extreame tributes, when no neceſſitie required; alwayes couetous, yet neuer thrifty; and ſtill gathering, yet neuer enriching his Coffers: All Eccleſiaſticall promotions then vacant, he aſſumed into his owne hands, and kept the See of Canterbury without an Archbiſhop aboue foure yeeres, ſetting to ſale the free-rights of the Church, and hee that would giue moſt came ſooneſt to preferment, whereby both the Lands and good eſteeme of the Clergy was dayly diminiſhed.

Theſe greeuances were complayned of vnto Pope Vrban, but he ouer-buſied to forward an expeditiō of Chriſtian Princes for the winning of Ieruſalem, had no leaſure ſeriouſly to thinke vpon their eſtates, or elſe leſſe minde to diuert Kings out of their owne byas, whoſe perſons he meant to reſerue for his owne gaine.

(12) The Storme thus cleared without any thunder; King Rufus ſet the eye of deſire vpon Duke Roberts dominions, who lately had done the like with his; and ſuddenly burſt into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africke; pretending reuenge of injuries done to his Kingdome; firſt therefore ſurprizing the Caſtles of Saint Valery and Albemarle, hee ſtored them with his owne Souldiers; then piercing forward did great ſpoyle in the Country. Robert deſtitute of meanes and knowing his Normans euer vnfaithfull, ſent to Philip the French King, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt his Brother-Enemy; who preparing towards

(31) Peace thus eſtabliſhed, and both their powers vnited, they bent altogether againſt Henry their yongeſt brother, who fearing afterclaps, had ſtrongly fortified the Caſtle of Mount Saint-Michael, ſituated vpon the confines of Normandy and Britaine: him, whom they ought to haue prouided for, (ſaith Gemeticenſis) they went about to expell, and all the Lent long layd ſiege againſt him.

Wil. Gemet.

It chanced one day as his men ſallied out, and made a brauado in the face of their beleaguers; King William alone, more bold then wiſe, rode againſt them, thinking none ſo hardy as to encounter him ſingle; but preſently a Knight ſlew his horſe vnder him, and his foote entangled in the ſtirrup hee was ouerthrowne; his enemy therefore with drawne ſword, was ready to haue ſlaine him, had hee not reuealed himſelfe by his voyce: the armed Men with great reuerence then tooke him vp, & brought him another horſe; when the King not ſtaying for the ſtirrup, ſprang into the ſaddle, and with an angry countenance demanded, who it was that ouerthrew him? The Knight as boldly anſwered, and ſhewed himſelfe who hee was: By Lukes-face, quoth William (for that was his oath) thou ſhalt be my Knight, and bee enrolled in my Cheeke, with a Fee anſwerable to thy worth.

(15) About this time, in the yeere of Grace, 1091. and fourth of King Rufus his raigne, one Eneon, the ſonne of Cadiuor, Lord of Dynet, mouing rebellion againſt Rees ap Twedor Prince of Southwales, drew to his ſide Ieſtyn Lord of Glamorgan, vpon promiſe to become his ſonne in law by the marriage of his daughter: Ieſtyn notwithſtanding, iudging their faction too weake, ſent Eneon into England, where hee was well acquainted, to procure ayde againſt Rees: who entring conference of his buſineſſe with Robert Fitz-hammon, a worthy Knight, of the Kings Priuie-Chamber, wrought ſo farre with him, being a man eaſily drawne to the exerciſe of warre, that for a Salarie he vndertooke the ſeruice, and with twelue Knights, and a competent number of ſouldiers went into Wales, where ioyning with Ieſtyn, in battle ſlew Prince Kees ap Tewdor, with Conan his ſon. Robert Fitz-hammon, now minding to returne, demanded his pay, according to couenants, which Ieſtyn in ſome part denyed, alledging that Eneon had gone beyond his commiſſion: whereupon ſuch diſcord aroſe, that theſe friends fell out, and Eneon thus touched in his reputation, ſided with the Engliſh, againſt his owne Country-men; wherevpon a battaile was fought, and Ieſtyn with moſt of his Welſh ſlaine, ſo that Robert with his followers obtained a fruitful poſſeſſion in thoſe parts (which by their poſterities are enioyed euen to this day) whoſe names, as they are found written in a Britiſh record, were as followeth:

An. D. 1092 Gemet. Malcolme King of Scotland enters England with a power.

(16) As theſe things were commenced betwixt England, Normandy, and Walles, Malcolme King of Scotland entred into the Engliſh Marches as farre as to Cheſter in the Streete, doing much harme; whoſe farther outrage to preuent, William incontinently haſted, ſending by Sea a great Nauy of Shippes, and by Land his brother Robert, though with much loſſe of either: for his Fleete was torne by tempeſt, and his horſemen through hunger and cold periſhed in thoſe barren parts: at length the Kings come to an Interview, where by the meanes of Edgar Atheling, a peace was concluded to both their contents: for William reſtored vnto Malcolme twelue Villages, which he had held in England vnder his Father, and gaue him yeerely twelue Markes in Gold: And King Malcolme for his part promiſed to keepe true peace with him as he had done with the Conquerour, whereunto he gaue him his Oath, as ſaith Mathew Paris,

(19) And hauing ſetled his affaires thus in the North, returneth with triumph into the South, where immediately, hee fell dangerouſly ſicke, in the ſixth yeare of his Raigne, at the City of Glouceſter; whoſe ſinnes beganne to ſit ſo neere his heart, (not looking to continue to commit many more) that hee ſore repented him of the ſame, making many promiſes to amend his life, if God would be pleaſed to giue him longer life: the hard lawes againſt the Engliſh, he vowed to reforme, as alſo his owne vices, and to ſettle peace and good order in the Church, then farre out of frame, for almoſt all the Monkes in England, liued rather like Conſuls, being Hunters, Hawkers, Dicers, and great Drinkers (ſayth Higden,) little regarding the rules of their profeſſion. Thoſe Biſhopricks and Monaſteries that were vacant, and in his owne hand, hee forthwith, and (much againſt his wont) freely beſtowed: the Arch-biſhopricke of Canterbury vpon Anſelme a learned Norman Abbot: the See of Lincolne hee gaue to Robert Bluet his Chancellour, a man of meane learning, and ſome other touches; but otherwiſe of many ſingular parts.

(20) But the danger paſt, and health recouered, hee beganne to be more ſicke in minde, ſoone repenting him of his too-ſoone Repentance: for as in ſpending his owne wealth he was very prodigall, ſo hee was very diligent to enter into other mens eſtates, & to gaine from them what hee could, and therefore tampereth with Anſelme, perſwading him, that the trouble of the Arch-biſhops place was very burthenous, eſpecially for a man wholly brought vp within the walles of a Monaſtery, deuoted to contemplation, and vnexperienced in the mannage of great affaires of State. But all his Art could not induce him to let goe his hold-faſt of the Kings abſolutely paſſed promiſe, nor yet to ſatisfie his great deſire with money, and therefore the King payd himſelfe out of his Lands. Likewiſe from Roger of Lincolne hee exacted fiue thouſand pounds; and the Commons hee fined for tranſgreſſion of his penall lawes; and in truth moleſted all for money: None were rich but

(22) Hereupon Earle Mowbray growing proud, and greatly suspected by King VVilliam, beganne to fortifie the Kings Castles, with Munition and Armes against the like inuasion, indeede against the Kings will; who sent him word somewhat roughly, to desist from his doings, and presently to repaire to his Presence; which whilest he lingered and neglected to doe, King VVilliam sent his brother Henry to spoile Northumberland, and immediately followed after himselfe, where without much adoe, he tooke the Earle, and committed him prisoner to VVindſor-Castle.

(23) These stirres in the North are diuersly reported: for Walsingham in his Ypodigma Neuſtriæ, sayth, that Robert Mowbray and William of Anco, with others, conspired to depriue the King both of Crowne and life, and to haue set vp Stephen de Albemarle, his Aunts sonne: the issue of which treason was preuented by surprizing Mowbray, who dyed a Prisoner. William of Anco was punished with losse of both his eyes and his virility; and William Aluerie (the Kings Godfather, kinsman and Sewer) cruelly whipped, and all naked goared in bloud, though guiltles, was hanged. Hector Boetius, the Scottish Historian relates somewhat otherwise of the death of King Malcolme; as that the English hauing gotten the Castle of Anwike, King Malcolme with a strong siege enuironed it about; when, the English distressed, and ready to surrender, a certaine Knight amongst them attempted a very desperate enterprize; for mounted vpon a swift horse, vnarmed, excepting only a light Speare in his hand, vpon the point whereof hee bare the keyes of the Castle, he rode directly to the Scottish Campe, and was with great applause brought vnto their King, where couching his staffe, as though he meant with submission to deliuer him the keyes, sodainely ranne him into the left eye, and through swiftnesse of his horse escaped, leauing the King there dead: for which act King William (saith he, though erroneously) changed the Knights name into Perce-eye, whence that noble Family is descended.

(24) Grudges now grown betwixt king William and Duke Robert his brother, each accusing other of breach of oath & of Couenants; William from Haſtings set saile into Normandy, where some bickering fell betwixt the two Brethren, but by the mediating of certaine graue persons, their quarrels were comprimised, and Princes chosen to be their Arbitrators; which hearing indifferently all allegations, adjudged king Rufus in the fault, who thereupon (as thinking nothing right, but what went with him) was so far from following their award, that beeing offended with their censure, hee presently assaulted and tooke the Castle of Burren; neither did Robert for his part sleepe the whiles, but surprised the Castle of Argenton, which was by former couenants giuen to King William, drawing likewise Philip the French King to his side, who with his Army entred Normandy for his assistance.

(all approuing Duke Robert, and diſallowing his Acts,) he ſought to doe that by mony, which he could not by ſword. Therefore to thoſe ſouldiers, which in heat of his furie, hee had commanded to bee ſent him into Normandy, (euen twenty thouſand, now in readineſſe, and at Haſtings ſtaying for a winde) hee ſent a countermand exacting of euery common ſouldier tenne ſhillings in money for the releaſe, and ſo without further trouble to returne to their homes; with which ſumme he ſo pacified the French King, that hee now left Robert to looke to himſelfe, who thus forſaken was conſtrained to come to an vnreaſonable peace.

Among theſe Chriſtian valiant Captaines, Duke Robert would be one, but wanting money, (no newes at all to his coffers) he ſent to his brother King William to bee ſupplyed, and for the ſumme of ſix thouſand, ſixe hundred, ſixty ſixe pound of ſiluer, (Paulus Aemilius ſaith ſix thouſand nine hundred thirty foure more) morgaged his Dutchy vnto him, giuing him the poſſeſſion thereof before his departure.

Lanfrank coũſelleth the King to ſubiect himſelfe to the Pope. Epiſt. Lanfran. M. S.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popiſh incroachments, attempted by the meanes of theſe chiefeſt Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) ſaw it was high time for him to preuent farther miſchiefes to his State, by following his Fathers ſteps, in timely repreſſing ſuch Papall intruſions: yea ſo farre was he from yeelding his necke to that yoake, that hee auowed, that the Popes, though boaſting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or looſing, whoſe godly ſteps they wholly neglected, following onely after Lucre and worldly Honours: that alſo it was but impoſture to teach Interceſſion, and bootleſſe to vſe Inuocation to Saints, euen to Saint Peter himſelfe. And as for the reſt of the Romiſh Clergie, who then gaue themſelues ſtrangely to worldly and fleſhly pleaſures, wearing their guilt Girdles and Spurres, and trimming their buſhie Locks; their looſe liues the King much deteſted, and ſought to puniſh; which moſt incenſed their Choler: and theſe were the haires no doubt in thoſe Monkiſh writers Pennes, that euer blotted his faire name, vnder their faſt-running, and vn-euen hands. For ſo much may we gather from Gemeticenſis, the Recorder of his life, who hauing reported many Acts of this Kings, ſeemeth laſtly to checke himſelfe for going ſo farre: where (he ſaith,) Theſe and many other like things wee could truely report of him, were it not we thinke it vnconuenient largely to relate his actions, becauſe he perſecuted very many of Gods ſeruants, and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought, by the moſt part of wiſemen, that he repented too late and vnprofitably.

(36) And true it is, that ſome of them haue taxed him for great Pride and Couetouſneſſe, whereof yet ſome pregnant examples to the contrary are not wanting; as, (though the inſtance be ſomewhat familiar) when his Chamberlaine bringing him a paire of new hoſe, and he demanding the price, was anſwered that they coſt three ſhillings; Away baſe

(37) His Couetousnesse what it was, may hence appeare, that when two Monkes whose Abbot was lately dead, repaired to his Court, and each in large offers out-vied and ouer-bad the other, to succeed in the Abbacy; a third Monke very sober, and poore in shew, accompanying them in their businesse, stood by; whom the King asked what hee would giue to be made Abbot? Nothing, said the Monke; for I entred my profession to be poore, and hitherto haue beene, little esteeming the pompe or riches of the World. Then thou art the man, (replied the King) and shalt bee their Abbot, more worthy in thy pouerty, then they for their price; and so conferring on him that high honour, checked the others, to their open infamy and reproach.

As the like he also did to Hugh a Norman Knight, and Souldier by profession, who of a sincere deuotion had entred the Monkish Order in the Monastery of S. Augustines at Canterbury, and at the death of Vido the Abbot, was but a Probationer; when comming with others to the King for the election of another, was chosen himselfe (though sore against his will) without any request or proffer; whose penitency and vnfained humilitie so moued the King, that in this his Election he burst forth into teares.

I would all Simoniackes might so be serued.

A preferment bestowed vnlooked for.

(38) Other faults I grant he is charged with, wherein we haue not and cannot vtterly acquit him: as this besides others, that his chiefest Consorts were Effeminated persons, Ruffians, and the like, and himselfe said to haue delighted continually in Adulteries, and the Company of Concubines, etiam coram Sole, shameless and in the sight of the Sunne; though none of them be named, nor any his illegitimate issue knowne; and yet onely, or especially for his sinnes, many strange signes of Gods wrath are reported to haue happened in the time of his raigne.

And not long after, so great a tempest of winde happened, that in London it bare downe sixe hundred Houses, and blew off the roofe of Bow-Church, which with the Beames were borne into the Ayre a great height; sixe whereof being twentie seuen foot long, with their fall, were driuen twenty three foote deepe into the ground, the streets of the City lying then vnpaued.

Of all which, or the most part, what better censure can wee giue then that which King William himselfe (when this last vision was told him) did deliuer; saying, *Well, a Monke he is, and can dreame (Monachiliter) as Monkes vse to doe, onely for gaine. CHAPTER IIII.

Will. Malmesb. Iohn Rouse. Annales S. Au. Mat. Paris.

HEnry the youngest son of the Conquerour, and third King of his Race, was borne here in England, and brought vp in learning euen from his Child-hood, whereby he gained to himselfe the high honour, very rare in those dayes, especially in Princes, to be, and to be stiled the Beauclerk: whose portion of Treasure was not a little, giuen him by his Father, neither any whit spared by himselfe to purchase friends at the death of his brother, * Henry of Newburgh the right Noble vertuous and learned Earle of Warwicke, euer making his way both with the Clergy

Clergy and Nobles, who* refused to admit any King but with capitulation and couenants to their owne likings.

(2) The steppes then by which he mounted the Throne of Maiesty, were the dislikes of Williams ouer-hard curbing of his Natiues, as he euer called the English, the rash and giddy-head of his brother Robert; his absence in Syria, for whose return to stay was dangerous, and whose election for King of Ierusalem, was likely to imploy his person there still: his English-Birth, hauing both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promises for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, imposed by his Father and Brother, the restoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Liuings; remission of taxes exacted on the subjects; and due punishments of such persons as were the chiefe causers thereof, in which behalfe to satisfie the people he committed Ralphe Bishoppe of Durham to the Tower. Then promising by Oath to frame just Lawes, grounded on those of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more desired) did wind himselfe so farre into the loues of all, that with a generall concurrence he was saluted King.

(3) He began his raigne the second of August; the sacred rites of whose Coronation were celebrated at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London, (in the absence of Anselme Arch-bishop of Canterbury) the fifth day of the same moneth, the yeare of Christ 1100. When Henry the fourth possessed the Imperiall Diadem, Philip the first swayed the Scepter of France, Edgar wore the Crowne of Scotland, and Paschall the second sate in the See of Rome.

(4) His first businesse was to put in execution what he had promised; and because hee might be thought vnfit to guide a large Kingdome, who cannot reforme those who are euer at his elbow, began, (as a good Prince ought) with his owne Court and Houshold (as knowing that to be the patterne and warrant of others enormities) whence he cashiered all Court-minions and nice or effeminate wantons, and enacting a decree against his Courtiers rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, punished their Thefts with *death, & Lechery with the *losse of their Eyes, and other parts peccant.

(5) Then he restor'd to the English the vse of lights, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the space of thirty-three yeares, ordaining likewise many good Lawes, and common Liberties, exemplified at large in Mathew Paris, which summarily may be thus abridged.

1 The Freedome of the Church from oppressions, or reseruation of their Possessions vpon vacancies.

2 That the Heires of his Nobilitie should possesse the Lands of their Fathers, without redemption from him, which fauour the Nobles likewise should afford to their Tenants.

3 That the Gentry might giue in Marriage their Daughters & Kinswomen without his Licence, so it were not to his Enemy.

4 That the widow should haue her Ioynter, and not be compelled to marry against her owne liking.

5 That the Mother or next of kindred, should be Guardian of the Lands of her Children.

6 That Coyners of false Money should be *punished; and likewise ordayned a measure to the length of his * Arme to be a standard for Commerce among his People.

7 Then did hee forgiue all debts to the Crowne before his owne time, and murthers committed before the day of his Coronation: with some other like Indulgences: But, to the greatest content of the People, hee gaue power and strength vnto King Edwards Lawes.

(6) To these his Ordinances he set his Name and Seale, with the subscription of sundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be transcribed & kept in the Monasteries of euery Prouince. Then did he recall Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus; and bestowed all vacant Church-liuings vpon the worthiest persons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the English, hee became a suter to Edgar King of Scotland, to haue his sister to wife, which was Maud the daughter of Queene Margaret, Sister to Edgar Atheling, and Grand-childe of Edmund Ironside, whereby his issue might meerely be both of the English bloud, and of the ancient English Kings.

(10) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was vpon the Kings fleet before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the moſt of the Engliſh fell to the Normans, either by the perſwaſiō of the Duke, or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize ouer them, as they did imagine: By which meanes the Duke, had ſafe landing at Porteſmouth and did not a little reioice in this his fortunate beginning; threatning his brother to be reuēged for his wrongs, & blaming the Nobility for ſuffering him thus to be abuſed, whileſt he for the common good of Chriſtendome, was imployed in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wiſe, as the other was valorous, wrought vnder-hand for an agreement of peace; for he very well ſaw, that the euent of warre hath commonly iſſue from the firſt ſucceſſe, and at one and the ſame time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; therefore certaine Noblemen on both ſides ſo trauiſed the buſineſſes, that the Brethren in ſhort time became friends, and a compoſition made to both their contents. The agreement was thus, that, becauſe Henry was borne after his fathers Conqueſt of this Land, and ſtood now the Crowned King, with common conſent, he ſhould during his life enjoy the ſame, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thouſand Markes by yeare: and the ſuruiuer to be heire to his brother deceaſed, if he died without a ſonne. In which it was alſo concluded, that all, either Engliſh or Normans, which had taken part with the King or Duke, ſhould be pardoned of all offences, and their Liuings againe reſtored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelue Princes vpon either parties tooke their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies preſently diſſolued.

(41) This was the moſt vntortunate Shipwrack that euer hapned in our Seas, bringing an inconceiueable heauineſſe to the King, and whole State: for therein periſhed Prince William Duke of Normandy, the ioy of his Father, and hope of his Nation; Richard his baſe Brother, his Siſter Maud Counteſſe of Perche, Richard Earle of Cheſter, with his wife Lady Lucy, the Kings Niece by his Siſter Adela, Otwell the Earles Brother; the young Dukes Gouernour, diuers of the Kings chiefe Officers, and moſt of the Princes; Geffrey Riddle, Robert Manduit, William Bigod, Geffrey Arch-deacon of Hereford, Walter de Crucie, & many other of prime note and eſteeme, to the number of one hundred and ſixty perſons, none of their bodies being found, though great ſearch was made for them.

(42) King Henry thus at once depriued of all his lawfull poſteritie (onely Maud the Empreſſe excepted) vpon the tenth of Aprill, and two and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, married his ſecond Wife Adelicia, a Lady of ſurpaſſing beauty, the daughter of Geffrey firſt Duke of Louain, in hope (though it proued otherwiſe) to haue repaired his late loſſes by iſſue of her; whoſe Coronation was appointed to be celebrated by Roger Biſhop of Sariſbury, the infirmity of Palſey ſo troubling Ralphe Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that himſelfe could not performe it; yet becauſe Roger was not appointed by him, he forbad his imployment; and the King wearing his Crowne, ſaith the Monke of Cheſter, this teſty olde man could hardly be entreated by the Lords, to with-hold his hands from ſtriking the ſame from the Kings head; of ſuch Spirits then were thoſe ſpirituall Prelates, & iealouſie to looſe their pompous preheminence of honour: but his high top was ſomewhat borne down by the boyſtrous blaſts of Pope Calixt, from whoſe holy hand Thurſtan Arch-biſhop of York (contrary to the Kings command, and his owne * Oath) hauing receiued conſecration, and thereupon forbidden by the King to put foot againe within his Dominions, his Holineſſe commanded his New-Creature ſhould be inſtalled (*againſt all right and cuſtome) without profeſſing any ſubiection to the See of Canterbury; and threatned with his curſe to interdite both Prouinces till that was performed. of the King, who contrary to the Canons of the late Romane Synode, did ſtill challenge and practiſe that * Regall prerogatiue.

(43) Whether it were about this contention of Inueſting, or about a Fryer of the Holy Sepulchre, whom (as Malmsbury ſaith) the King had impriſoned, or about Thurſtans hard vſage; certaine it is, that the Pope much deſiring to haue priuate talke with the King, came to him into Normandy, & ſo at Giſors conferred (ſaith Paris) the Great King and the High Priest: but notwithſtanding the Popes threates or intreates, Thurſtan was kept in baniſhment full fiue yeares, and then for the Popes pleaſure was reſtored. But at this meeting the King was ſo liberall of rich gifts to the Pope and his Cardinals, that therefore the Pope (ſaith a Monke) held him a moſt wiſe and eloquent perſwader, and his actions very iuſtifiable: But it ſeemeth the Cardinals were neither ſo eloquent nor learned as they ſhould be, for that (ſaith he) two youths in the Kings Company, ſonnes of the Earle of Mellent (learned both, and therefore fit to be with that learned King) reaſoning of ſome points with them, and diſputing Scholler-like with Logical Syllogiſmes, the Grand Rabbies (vſed to other exerciſes at Rome, then ſtudying) were quite gruelled, and had nothing to ſay, but that more learning was in theſe Weſterne parts, then they had thought. But as theſe Church-ſtirres did not a little diſquiet the King, ſo alſo did new Welſh tumults, raiſed by Meredith ap Blethyn, who with the three ſonnes of Cadogin, Eneon, Madoc, and Morgan, ſore troubled the Kings people and peace, by breaking into the Marches, and eſpecially into Cheſ-ſhire, where they burned two Caſtles. The King therefore making towards them, had ſent his maine Army to cõduct the Carriages, whilſt himſelfe with a ſmall Company tooke a neerer way through the Mountaines and Straites; which being fore-laid by the Enemy, was with great courage ſet vpon, and through the aduantage of the place, many of his men ſlaine, and more hurt by the Welſh Archers, whoſe ſhowers of Arrowes rained thicke vpon them from the higher ground: amongſt which, one was ſo leuelled at the King, that it ſtrucke him on the breaſt, yet being ſurely armed, did him no hurt; but he therewithall wonderfully diſmayed, and by likelihood fearing ſome treaſon amongſt his owne, (for, then hee ſwore by our Lords death, his vſuall oath, that no Welſh-man ſhot that Arrow, but one of his owne Prouincials) and conſidering that by theſe his ouer-raſh proceedings, his glory purchaſed in more famous parts, might againe be loſt in this wilde and rude Country; came to a Parley and Peace; receiuing of the King a thouſand head of Cattle, and leauing Lord Fitz-Warren Lieutenant of the Marches, returned to England, where he held three Parliaments in the ſame yere, one at Norwich, another at Northampton, and the third at London.

(44) The Normans ſtill repining at the Captiuity of Robert their late Duke; and ſtanding well affected vnto his Son, thought now the time fitting, (Prince William being dead) to raiſe the other William his Coſen Germane into his place: who as the Monke of Cheſter affirmeth, married Sibyl the other daughter of Foulke, Earle of Anion, with whom he receiued the Earledome of Cenomannia, vpon diſpleaſure that King Henry with-held the formers dowry in England. The chiefe in this action was Robert Earle of Mellent, who was lately fallen off from the King: Henry therefore haſting into Normandy, beſieged his Caſtle Pont-Audomar, and tooke it, and at that time built a large & high wall with many Bulwarkes about the Tower of Roan, repaired the Caſtles of Caen, Arches, Giſors, Faleiſe, Argenton, Damfort, Vernon, Ambres, and ſundry others.

(45) In the meane time, Earle Mellent deſirous to be reuenged vpon the King, aſſociated Hugh Earle of Montfort and others vnto his ayd, who entring Normandy, with fire and ſword, did much harme as they went, thinking to bring all to their obeyſance: againſt whoſe outrages, William Tankeruile the Kings Chamberlaine, and Lieutenant in thoſe parts, addreſſed himſelfe, and training them into danger of an Ambuſh, laid for that purpoſe, after long fight tooke them both priſoners, and preſented them to his Maſter, whereby the warres ceaſed for a time in thoſe parts.

(46) In this the Kings abſence, but yet with his licence, Iohannes Cremenſis the Popes holy Cardinall, came into England, ſent by Honorius the Second, there to redreſſe the ſtill continued ſinne-ſeeming abuſe of the Clergie, in retaining and vſing, according to Gods owne Ordinance, the Societie of their wiues. all the Bishops and Abbots with great and costly Presents, and afterward being solemnly set in a Councell at London, vpon the birth-day of the Blessed Virgin, made a solemn Oration in prayse of Virginity, and Chastity, with a terrible inuectiue against the married Priests: and to amplifie their sinnes the more, he shewed what extreame impietie it was, to rise from the bed of vnlawfull lust, (for so was their chaste Marriage termed) and with polluted hands to touch the Sacrament of the body of Christ; but the same night following, he* hauing that very day consecrated that holy Sacrament, was himselfe taken with a Whore, the matter being so apparant, that it could not be hid, (neither ought it to be silenced, saith Huntingdon) to the great reproach of those most vnchaste boasters of Chastitie, as both Paris and Higden themselues doe confesse: and so he returned to Rome with shame enough, but with little successe in that intended businesse: till some few yeares after* King Henry, seeming very desirous to settle his pretenced continency in the Clergie, in a Councell held at London, obtained (through simplicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, saith Paris,) that himselfe should haue the execution of iustice and punishments of the Priests, that offended either in keeping of their wiues, or vsing of Concubines, (for likely those that liked not the one, loued the other, as well as Cremensis) but euen then also, the Kings end being onely to get in summes of money, which he had still occasions to vse, euery man redeemed his libertie by his purse, and matters rather proued worse, then any whit reformed.

(48) Giraldus and Higden, and some ancient Manuscripts affirme (but with very little probabilitie or credit) that Henry the Emperour dyed not at this time (as was giuen forth;) but that rather vpon a remorse of conscience, for imprisoning his owne naturall Father, Henry the third vnto death; and also his Spirituall Father the Pope, with his Cardinals; repenting these outrages, hee laid aside his Imperiall Robe, and secretly fled into England, where at Westchester, hee became an Hermite, changing his name vnto * Godscall, where he so liued the space of tenne yeares, & was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Werburga the Virgine. Vpon which his suddaine flight and missing, the Empresse *Maud some say, was suspected to be guiltie of his death, and for that cause was kept continually in the Queenes Chamber. Indeed, that she abode still in Chamber with the Queene, Paris records; but hee giues a wiser reason thereof, for that her Father did loue her exceedingly, as being now his sole Heire; and where should an Empresse rather liue then with a Queene? a Daughter, then with her Mother? a faire Lady, a Widow, and an Heire of so great a Kingdome, then where her person might bee safest from danger, her minde from inueigling, and her carriage from suspition? But as for that other idle conjecture, it is razed out, both by those Writers, who record his Buriall, and Monument at Spire, (as * Higden himselfe signifieth) and also by the penne of William Gemeticensis, who reporteth her to bee a woman generally well thought of, and approued among the greatest Princes of the Empire, for her prudent and gratious behauiour towards the Emperour her husband; insomuch that they became suters vnto her, seeking by all meanes to attaine her to gouerne them, and to that end attended her to King Henry in Normandy to sollicite the same; to whom in no wise he would giue his consent, meaning to make her his Successor in the Kingdome: Whereunto Malmsbury (who then liued) accordeth; saying, shee was very vnwilling to haue come out of those parts of the Empire, where both her dowry and

(49) But King Henry afterwards desirous to bee free from the variances of these forraine Princes, and hearing that Foulke Earle of Anion had giuen his Earledome, with the Territories of Gaunt and Turyn, vnto his Sonne Ieffrey Martell, surnamed Plantaginet, (himselfe minding to abide at Ierusalem, whereof hee was King in right of his Wife Milisent, the daughter of Baldwine de Burge lately deceased) thought him the fittest to be linked into his alliance, and therefore concluded a marriage betwixt the said Ieffrey, and his onely lawfull daughter Lady Maud the Empresse, though partly against her liking, as both Gemeticensis and Gernasius of Canterbury doth declare; which was solemnized in Normandy the third of April accordingly.

(50) That William, sonne to the Curtoise, was formerly fauoured by Earle Foulke, we haue shewed, but now he was further followed with increase of Fortune, and the French Kings aid, onely for a rubbe in King Henries way; for Charles Earle of Flanders, being traiterously murdered by his owne People without any his issue to succeed him, Lewis of France (to make William faster to him) set him in possession as the next heire in bloud vnto that Earledome: William being the son of Duke Robert, and Robert the eldest of Queene Maud (the wife of the Conquerour) and shee daughter to Earle Baldwin the fifth; whose issue Male now failing, the right was from her deriued vnto this her Grand-child William.

(53) Were it not reported by some Writers of note, I might heere well passe ouer certaine presaging dreames (as the Monkes interpreted them) which King Henry had, being ready now to goe into Normandy: for to his seeming he saw a sort of rusticke plough-men with their Instruments of husbandry; after them Souldiers with their weapons of Warre; and lastly, the Bishops with their Crosier staues, all of them angerly threatning, and attempting his death: wherewith hee was so perplexed, that leaping out of his bed, he called for helpe; but seeing it but a dreame, as a dreame hee esteemed it, and passed ouer into Normandy: where long hee staid not, but that his Daughter Maud, vpon some displeasure, departed from her husband, and came with her Father into England. Some write that she was the prouoker of certaine displeasures betwixt her Husband and Father, which so affected his minde with passions of wrath and griefe, that many thought it was a great hastning of his end; and indeed Malmesbury witnesseth that the King vpon his deathbed passionately mentioned the wrongs and indignities wherewith her husband had disquieted his mind. Howbeit soone after this her departure from him, by consent of the States, who met at Northampton; shee was reconciled to her Husband, sent vnto him vpon his intreaty, and bare him a sonne, whose name was Henry; for joy whereof, King Henry assembled his Lords, and againe made his said Daughter, and the lawfull heires of her body his Successors in his Dominions.

She was the second wife of the Emperour Henry the fourth, espoused at sixe yeares of age, and at eleuen with great solemnitie was married and crowned his Empresse at Mentz in Germany, 6. Ianuary, Anno 1114. the ninth of her husbands, and foureteenth of her Fathers raignes. Shee was his Wife twelue yeares, and suruiued him, without any issue by him; and comming into England a widdow, shee had fealtie sworne vnto her by the Nobilitie, and was re-married to Geffrey Plantaginet Earle of Anion, sonne of Foulke King of Ierusalem, vpon the third of Aprill, and yeare of Grace 1127. by whom shee had issue, Henry, the second, King of England, Geffery Earle of Nantes in Britanie, & William, who was called Earle of Poyto: She was his wife twenty three yeares, and suruiuing him also, continued a widdow the last seuenteen yeeres of her life, which which she ended in the Citie of Roan the tenth of September, 1167. the fourteenth of the raigne of King Henry her sonne, and was buried in the Abbey of Bec in Normandy.

Richard. (64) Richard, a second sonne to King Henry, and Queene Maud, by the testimony of Gervasius the Monke of Canterbury, who maketh Maud their eldest Child, William the second, and lastly, Richard; and then (saith he) she left bearing: but Malmesbury saith, shee had but two Children, one of each sexe.

Eufem. (65) Eufem, also another daughter, and fourth Childe (by Hector Boetius the Scottish Historian) is said to be borne vnto the Beauclarke by Queene Maud; the credite of the two last, I leaue to the reporters, who onely thus name them, without any further relation.

His Naturall Issue.

Robert (66) Robert, the naturall sonne of King Henry, was Earle of Glouceſter, and married Mabil daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-hammon Lord of Glamorgan, by whom he had issue William Earle of Glouceſter, Richard Bishop of Bayon, Roger Bishop of Worceſter, and Maud the wife of Randolph Gernon, the mother of Hugh Keueliot Earle of Cheſter, and Richard his brother: Earle William married Auis daughter of Robert Bossu Earle of Leiceſter, and had issue three daughters and heires of that Earledome, which by Auis the second of them, in the end descended to Clare Earle of Hertford. This Earle Robert died the last of October, in the twelfth yeare of King Stephen, and was buried at Briſtow in the Church of Saint Iames, which he had founded, and his body laide in the midst of the Quire; vnto him William Malmesbury dedicated his Booke called Hiſtoria Nouella.

Richard. (67) Richard, another naturall sonne of King Henry, was as it seemeth by an ancient Regiſter of the Monaſtery at Abington, born in the raigne of King William Rufus, of the widow of Anskill, a Nobleman of the Country adioyning to the said Monastery; and it seemeth he is that Richard that was drowned in the Norman Seas, neere Barbfleet, among the rest of King Henries children.

Reynold. (68) Raynold, the naturall son of King Henry, was borne of a daughter vnto Sir Robert Corbet, Lord of Alceſter in Warwickſhire, by the gift of the King in fauor of her, who was after married to Henry Fitzherbert his Chamberlaine. This Raynold was created Earle of Cornwall, and Baron of Caſtle-comb, with consent of King Stephen, and had issue foure daughters, of whom haue sprung many faire branches.

Robert. (69) Robert, another of that name, was borne of Edith, the sister of Iue, son and daughter of Earne, the sonne of Sigewolfe, both of them great Barons in the North: which Edith afterwards King Henry gaue in marriage to Robert Doilie, Baron of Hook-Norton in Oxford-ſhire; and with her gaue him the Manor of Eleydon, in the Countie of Buckingham, by whom he had issue Henry Doylie Baron of Hook-Norton, who oftentimes mentioneth this Robert in his Charters, euer calling him Robert his brother the Kings sonne.

Gilbert. (70) Gilbert, another naturall sonne of King Henry, is named in the additions to the story of William Gemeticenſis the Norman Monke, in the Chronicle of that Country, written by Iohn Taylor, being a Translator of that Worke out of Latine into French; and lastly, in the Treaties betwixt England and France, written in the French tongue by Iohn Tillet, Secretarie to their late King Henry the second, and yet in them, not any other mention is made, but onely of his name.

William. (71) William, also a naturall sonne of Henry the King, had giuen vnto him the Towne of Tracie, in Normandy; of which he tooke his surname, and was called William of Tracie: But whether he were the Progenitor of the Tracies, sometime Barons in Deuon-ſhire, or of them that now be of the same surname; or whether Sir William Tracie, one of the foure Knights that slew Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterburie, were any of his posteritie, is not certainly reported: nor any thing else of him, more then that he died a little after his Father, which was in the yeere of Christ, 1135.

Henry. (72) Henry, another naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Neſta, daughter of Rees ap Towdor Prince of South-Wales, who was the Wife of Sir Gerard Windſor, and of Stephen, Constables of the Castles of Pembrooke, and Abertiuie in Wales, and Progenitors of the Families of the Fitz-geralds, and the Fitz-Stephens in Ireland; he was borne and bred, and liued, and married in Wales, hauing issue two sonnes, namely, Meiler and Robert, of which, Meiler the elder married the daughter of Hugh Lacie, Lord of Methe in Ireland: he was at the conflict in the Ile of Anglesey, between Magnus the sonne of Harold Harfager, King of Norway, and Hugh of Mountgomery, Earle of Arundell and Shrewesbury, wherein he was slaine, as some say, with the said Earle Anno 1197.

Maud. (73) Maud, the Naturall daughter of King Henry, was Countesse of Perche, and the first Wife of Earle Rotroke, the first of that name, son of Arnolfe de Hesding, the first Earle of that County. Shee had issue by him one onely daughter, named Magdale, wife to Garcy the fourth King of Navarre, mother of King Sanches, surnamed the wise, from whom all the Kings of Navarre are descended. Shee died vpō Friday the twenty sixth of November, in the twentieth of her Fathers raigne, and yeare of Grace 1120. being drowned in the Sea with her brother Duke William.

Maud. (74) Maud, another of that name, and naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Conan the first of that name, surnamed the Grosse, Earle of little Britaine in France, son of Earle Alan by Ermengard his second wife; by Alan shee had issue Howell, pronounced illegitimate, and disherited by his supposed father Constance, that died without issue; and Bertha the wife of Eudes Earle of Porrohet, mother of Earle Conan the yonger, who by Margaret sister of William King of Scots, had issue Constance, married to Geffrey sonne of King Henry the second.

Iulian. (75) Iulian likewise, another naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Eustace the illegitimate sonne of William Lord of Bretevil in Normandy, who was the sonne and heire of william Fitz-Osborne, and elder brother of Roger, both Earles of Hereford in England, and this Eustace had he beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had beene heire to the Earledomes of Hereford and Iuerie: notwithstanding he had as small a part in that inheritance of the Towne of Pacie from which he tooke his surname, being commonly called Eustace of Pacy, and had issue by this Iulian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his sonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuer of the History of William Gemeticensis, and by John Tillet his follower, is reported by them to haue beene married to one William Goet a Norman, but in neither of these writers is any mention made of her name, or of his estate, issue, or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henry is without name, recited by the said Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the Countie of Maygne. She had issue by him, as Roger of Houeden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queene Ermengard the wife of king William of Scotland: and Robert the Abbot of Mount Saint Michael mentioneth another of her sonnes, named Ralphe, who (as he saith) was Bishop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter also of King Henry is recited by the Normane and French writers before anouched, and reported by them to be married to Mathew of Montmorancy, the sonne of Bouchard of Montmorancy, from whom perhaps descended the House of Mountmorancy, who after came to be Earles & Dukes, being growne to be one of the greatest Houses in France, next to the Princes of the bloud, for possessions, alliances, and honour.

Elizabeth. (79) Elizabeth the last naturall daughter of King Henry, recounted by the former Authors, was vnmarried in the time of the one, and her husband vnknowne to the other, but both of them agree, that she was borne of Elizabeth the sister of Walleran Earle of Meulan, who was sister also of Robert Bossu Earle of Leicester, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembrooke, and mother of Earle Richard Strongbow, the Conquerour of Ireland.

CHAPTER V.

THough the Empresse Maud had fealtie sworne vnto her in the life time of her Father: & again both her selfe, and issue ordained to bee his successors in Englands Throne, as hath beene said; yet so powerfull is Ambition, where the Object is a Diademe, and so weake are all assurances which are built on the wauering Multitude, that King Henries prouidence, was soone defeated, and with his death all fealties reuersed, and that by him onely who had * contended to be the formost of the Laitie in taking that oath, euen Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Bolloine; a man man whoſe deſcent was very Noble, being the third ſonne of Stephen Earle of Bloys & Champaigne, who was the ſonne of Earle Eudes, and he of Earle Theobald, the ſonne of Gerlon the Dane, the companion of Rollo Duke of Normandy; his Mother was* Adelicia the third daughter of William the Conquerour by Queene Maud his wife: And himſelfe was aduanced to be Earle of Mortaigne by King Henry his vncle, whoſe Crowne he now endeauoured to vſurpe, being otherwiſe for his many princely parts, worthy to weild a Scepter, if his claime thereto had beene juſt and warrantable.

(2) For as ſoone as Natures courſe had brought King Henry, where Princes and pooreſt ſubjects are all equall, forthwith hee was working to diſpoſſeſſe his Iſſue, which onely now reſted in Maud and her Children; in which attempt it happened fortunately for him that his yonger Brother Henry was then Biſhop of Wincheſter, and a very potent man in the State, who had induſtriouſly ſtirred himſelfe in making way to his entrance; and (vpon aſſurance of all liberties to the Church and Common-wealth) had drawne on alſo William Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, the very firſt man that had ſworne vnto Maude the Empreſſe: by whoſe example many others were winded into the like perjury, * trayterouſly auowing, that it was baſeneſſe for ſo many, and ſo great Peeres, to be ſubject vnto a Woman. And to helpe forward thoſe audacious beginnings, Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury, the late Kings Treaſurer, proteſted (Malmesbury, who reports it, himſelfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Empreſſe; for that without cõſent of the Barons ſhe had married out of the Realme; but that which wrought moſt, was the teſtimony of Hugh Bigot, *Seneſcall vnto King Henry departed, who comming ouer with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, vpon ſome offence taken againſt his daughter Maude, diſinherited her, and appointed this Stephen, his nephew, to be his ſucceſſour. Theſe colourable inſtigations ſo moued the * too credulous Arch-biſhop and the Peeres, that they all ſwore fealty vnto him, and became his Liege-men.

(3) His firſt landing in England, (being at Whitſand-bay) by a tempeſt of thunder ſo wonderfull and terrible, that the people thought verily the end of all was at hand, did prognoſticke the ſtormes of troubles which his perjurie brought with him; for euen then both Douer and Canterbury fortified themſelues againſt him, though London gaue better leaue to his entrance, whoſe Perſon and preſence drew euer the affections of the beholder, being in all parts compleate with natures endowmẽts, of perſonage paſſing comely, of diſpoſition louing, cheerefull, and affable to the meaneſt, alwaies very liberall; but now eſpecially, knowing his Purſe the beſt Lawyer to plead for his Title; and in Martiall proweſſe gaue place to none of that time, wherein, though his whole raigne was continually ſpent, yet (by reaſon of King Henries great Treaſure left) neuer burthened hee the Commons with any exactions, a thing that euer gaineth the loue of the common ſort: neither is he taxed with any other obſeruable crime, ſaue onely his perjurie againſt the Empreſſe Dowager, and her ſonne.

(4) He entred his gouernement the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1135. the ſecond day of December, and was crowned at Weſtminſter the twenty ſixt of the ſame Moneth, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who with the reſt of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeeld to any conditions (for performance whereof his *Brother of wincheſter did there engage himſelfe for a pledge) they all took their oath of allegiance, conditionally, (trayterouſly, I might ſay) to obey him as their King, ſo long as he ſhould preſerue their Church Liberties, and the vigour of Diſcipline: And that the Lay-Barons made vſe alſo of this policie, appeareth by Robert Earle of Glouceſter, who ſware to be true Liege-man to the King, as long as the King would preſerue to him his dignities, and keepe all Couenants, whereupon the King promiſed for the preſent, that he would ſpeedily reform the ouerhard Lawes of his Predeceſſors, & mollifie the extreames thereof, to their own likings, vnder his Seale and Charter: and ſo thence haſtening to meete the Corpſe of his deceaſed Vncle, (which was now brought into England) he honoured that pompous funerall, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres attendance at Reading; whence preſently hee went to Oxford, where he ſealed his fore-promiſed Charter, of many indulgent fauours: * prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election

King Stephens Charter.

Election onely; and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the ſame; whereby may be conceiued, that his Holineſſe, either out of hatred to the Empreſſe, (whoſe husband * Henry was no friend to the Papacie) or for ſome other holy ends, had no ſmall hand in aduancing Stephens perjured and diſloyall intruſion. The Tenour of the * Charter it ſelfe is; That all Liberties, Cuſtomes, and Poſſeſſions, granted to the Church, ſhould be firme and in force; that all Perſons and Cauſes Eccleſiaſticall ſhould appertaine onely to Eccleſiaſticall Iudicature: that none but Clergie-men ſhould euer intermeddle with the vacancies of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad vſages in the Land touching forreſts, exactions, &c. ſhonld be vtterly extirpate; the ancient Lawes reſtored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had choſen him their King, onely to make their vſes of him, ſo theſe immunities he granted, rather to bleare their eyes, then * with any purpoſe to manacle his owne hands with ſuch Parchment-Chaines.

(5) This his entrance was very peaceable, (ſaith Gernaſius of Canterbury) but by little and little, ciuill diſcord increaſed, to the lamentable deſtruction of Men, and the Land: whereto Robert Earle of Glouceſter, halfe-brother to the Empreſſe, whoſe wiſedome and power King Stephen much feared, gaue a ſecret beginning, when amongſt them that ſwore him fealtie, hee concluded his (as we ſaid) with this reſeruation, that his owne authoritie ſhould be nothing empaired, meaning no longer to reſpect him as his King, then the King ſhould him as a Peere: and a generall ſufferance to erect Caſtles, for ſtrength, throughout the Land, was no ſecurity to his peaceable eſtate: Intended indeed to ſtrengthen the Kingdome againſt Maud the Empreſſe; but proued the bane of all ſubjectiue obedience: which was politickly conſidered by Henry Fitz-Empreſſe, in the concluſion of Peace betwixt King Stephen and him, when a thouſand one hundred and fifteene Caſtles ſo raiſed, were again razed and caſt downe.

(6) The firſt man that profeſſedly ſet himſelfe oppoſite to Stephens vſurpation, was Baldwin de Redners, who fortified the Citie and Caſtle of Exceſter againſt him; the Welſhmen alſo, bearing in mind the harmes that K. Henry had done them, deſired reuenge, and made many ſlaughters vpon the Kings people: Againſt theſe, Stephen proceeded with his band of Engliſh and Flemmings, and after a ſtrong and chargeable ſiege, by famine drew forth Baldwin, his wife, and children, all which he diſherited, and expulſed the Land, vſing ſo great lenitie towards all other offenders there, that it gaue great encouragement to others rebellions. But in Wales the buſineſſe proſpered not ſo well, where at Cardigan a great battle was fought, with ſuch ſlaughter and ouer-bearing of the Engliſh, that the men, by women, were taken and led away captiue, & ſo many drowned by the fall of a Bridge ouer Temd, that a paſſage was made ouer the water with the dead Carkaſes therein heaped.

(7) Neither thus onely, but ſome of the Engliſh alſo diſtaſting King Stephen, ſecretly inſtigated Dauid King of Scotland, to reuenge the wrongs done to the Empreſſe Maud, a ſeruice as they vrged it, very gratefull vnto her, and euen pleaſing to God and Man. He therefore conſenting, inuaded the Borders, and tooke from the Engliſh both Carleile and Newcaſtle, which he ſtuffed with Garriſons. Againſt theſe, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into thoſe parts, where diuers accidents by diuers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere-long peace was concluded, Carleile ſtill enioyed by King Dauid, and the Earldome of Huntingdon by Prince Henry his ſonne; for which he did homage at his Fathers command, Dauid himſelfe refuſing ſo to doe, (as Hector Boetius the Scotiſh Writer affirmeth) for that he had giuen his faith before vnto Maud the Empreſſe.

(8) King Stephen returned, and all in good quiet, he ſuddenly fell ſicke of a Lethargy, yea, and in ſuch danger of life, that the common report gaue forth hee was dead, which ſtirred great troubles both in England, and elſe-where, for thereby his friends were ſtricken into great feare, and the factious more bold to prepare for Queene Maude; for Hugh Bigot one of his chiefeſt and firſt raiſers, fortified himſelfe in the Caſtle of Norwich, and would not deliuer it vnto any ſaue onely to the King, yea and very vnwillingly alſo vnto him: and in Wales, Owen and Cadwalader the ſonnes of Gruffith ap Conan Prince of that Country, carried great ſpoyles from the Engliſh, as of other goods, ſo alſo of Horſe and Armour, and habiliments for warre; likewiſe in Normandy, Conſpiracies began to to bud forth; for Geffrey Earle of Anion, who in right of his wife made claime vnto all: easily got the hearts and endeuours of many to adhere vnto the true heire; possessing himselfe of certaine Castles; but entring further on the Demaines of one Talevaz, a man of note (proscribed for some offence or displeasure by King Stephen) the Normans disliking that, and some other his doings, sent for Theobald Earle of Bloys (Stephens elder brother) offering him both their Dukedome, and their swords, and liues to defend him in it; who cõming to Luxonia, Robert Earle of Gloucester, (not vnwilling any way to weaken King Stephen) deliuered vnto him vpon composition, the Countie of Faleſia, himselfe carrying no smal summe of money thence out of K. Henries Treasury, & very throughly, (though secretly) watching all opportunities to aduãce the title and designes of the Empresse.

(9) Stephen recouered, and hearing these stirres, prepared himselfe first into Normandy, at whose approach, after some small attempts, the people (distracted betwixt feare & sense of their duty) yeelded themselues vnto his power; surrendring their fenced Cities, and other strong holds. This good successe thus fortunately begunne, hee hoped further to prosecute, by meanes of a League, which hee lately had made with Lewis the seuenth, King of France: and hereupon created Eustace his eldest sonne liuing, Duke of Normandie, commanding him to doe his homage for the same to Lewis.

(11) Hauing thus at once swept the two greatest rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all clouds of displeasure, and opposition, were now ouer-blowne, when vnexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumults, the sparkes of conspiracie kindled secretly before in the hearts of factious Peeres, now openly breaking forth, vpon aduantage of his absence in Normandy: therefore, hauing not altogether composed his busines in those parts, he tooke ship for England in the depth of the winter; and euen in the Vigill of Christs Natiuity, besieged, and after tooke the Castle of Bedford, that was manned against him in the behalfe of the Scots; about which time Dauid their King hauing entred Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maude, the ruder sort of his Army (as cõmonly the best gouerned is not emptie of such) reuenged too tragically the wrongs of the Empresse, in ripping vp the wombes of women with childe, and tossing their Infants vpon the points of their speares, slaying the Priests at the Altar, and dismembring the slaine bodies in most vnhumane manner.

(13) Earle Robert, (whom eft-ſoones the enraged King diſcharged of his honours and poſſeſſions in England) tooke into the Caſtle of Briſtow, & made good alſo his Caſtle of Slede; his complices likewiſe did the like in other places: for William Talbot manned the Caſtle of Hereford, William Louell the Caſtle of Carie, Paganell the Caſtle of Ludlow, William de Mount the Caſtle of Duneſtor, Robert de Nichol the Caſtle of Warram, Euſtace Fitz-Iohn the Caſtle of * Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Caſtle of Shrewsburie, and Walkelinus the Caſtle of Doure. And thus thoſe Forts which were erected to defend the Crowne, firſt offended the King, ſome few wherof as he recouered, he flatted to the ground, and wiſhed the other no higher walles; ſtill ſwearing by Gods Birth (his vſuall Oath) hee would not ſo ſleightly bee vnſeated of his Crowne, and wondring what ſhould moue them, who had ſo readily aduanced him, ſo ſpeedily to vnſtate him. One freſh motiue to theſe Noble-mens diſcontents was the Kings* ſeizing on ſome great men and their Lands, on bare ſuſpition of their loyaltie; and on the other ſide, the extraordinary fauour, which Stephen ſhewed to William de Ypre, and his Flemmings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themſelues and their Nation) whoſe counſells he generally followed, and chiefly relyed vpon: In diſdaine whereof, they ſent word to the Empreſſe, that within fiue Moneths, ſhee ſhould haue the Realme at command, according to their Oathes made to her Father.

(14) Theſe turmoiles thus working in the bowels of the Kingdome, David King of Scotland had better opportunitie to aſſayle the ſides and skirts thereof; and following what hee had begunne, with a very great Army entring Northumberland, made great ſlaughter of the Engliſh, and deſtruction of their Countrey: Againſt whom the Northerne Lords prepared, at the command of Thurſtan Arch-biſhop of Yorke (left by King Stephen Lieutenant in thoſe parts) who being by ſickneſſe kept from the Field, appointed Ralph Biſhop of Durham his Generall; whoſe Inuectiue Oration before their joyning of battle, occaſioned vpon the foreſaid miſdemeanors of ſome vndiſciplined Scotiſh, is at large ſet downe by Houedon, Huntingdon, Wendouer, and others; in the cloſe whereof, he abſolueth from puniſhment of ſinne, all ſuch of his ſide, as ſhould die in this battaile: which made the Engliſh more deſperate in fight, who ſo ſorely preſſed vpon their enemies, that they forſooke their King, he notwithſtanding valiantly perſiſting, till his deareſt friends earneſtly vrged him to auoide. But his ſon Henry, eſteeming more of glory then life, ruſhed in amongſt his retiring ſouldiers, and with vndaunted courage, perſwading them to regard themſelues and his preſence, with threat of ſhameful deaths to all ſuch as fled, he held them in for a time; till at length ouer-laide with the maine-battaile of the Engliſh, the magnanimious Prince Henry, likewiſe quitted the field, bitterly curſing the frowardnes of Fortune, and the miſchance that happned that day.

Soone after whoſe departure, Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, with his Counteſſe and Brother, comming to Lincolne, to keepe their Chriſtmas; the Citizens knowing the Kings jealouſies, and deſirous to currie-fauour with him, ſent ſecret intelligence, that if he would ſurprize both thoſe Brethren, he had now the fitteſt aduantage: whereto the King giuing eare, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumvented, ſtood on their guard in the Caſtle, the Earle eſcaped forth, & went to craue ayde of the Empreſſe, for reſcue of his Wife and Brother, whom he left beſieged.
